ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — Yasser Arafat, named president of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) leader, who arrived from neighbouring Djibouti. Also Wednesday, Arafat was quoted as warning that his squads have fanned out in a number of European and Arab countries to attempt the assassination of Palestinian leaders. Arafat told the editor in chief of the London-based weekly Al Mawakeel that the hit squads are of different nationalities, including a Palestinian. "There are three groups, but according to the names available to me only one person involved is a Palestinian and the rest belong to other nationalities," said Arafat. "There have always been such attempts perpetrated by the Israelis, international intelligence agencies and Arab agents," said Arafat without going into detail. Excerpts from the interview ran in the weekly's Jeddah based, sister English-language newspaper, Arab News.

Al Hussein inaugurates King Abdullah Mosque

AMMAN (Agencies) — His Majesty King Hussein Wednesday inaugurated the King Abdullah Ibn Al Hussein the Martyr's Mosque at Abdali in Amman and joined worshippers in Al 'Atr prayers.

"I am greatly honoured to open this great mosque named after a great man who devoted his life and his efforts to build this country and serve its people," King Hussein said in an inaugural address at the official opening ceremony.

The King paid tribute to the late King Abdullah, his grandfather and founder of the Kingdom, who laid the ground for the political, constitutional, parliamentary, social and economic life of the country.

"Indeed, the late King Abdullah paved the way for the future generations of this Kingdom to live a decent life and to enjoy security and carry on with the construction and progress that serves the Arab nation as a whole," the King said.

"The late King Abdullah has fought hard in defence of the Arab homeland and fell as a martyr while defending the Arab and Islamic nation's rights in the Holy City of Jerusalem where he is buried alongside his father Sharif Hussein Ibn Ali near the Aqsa Mosque," King Hussein added.

He said the late King Abdullah inherited the great mission of the Great Arab Revolt that was led by Sharif Hussein Ibn Ali at the turn of this century to lead the Arab nation to freedom and unity.

"The construction of the new mosque in Amman which bears the late King's name is a show of respect and appreciation of his remarkable endeavours and his services to his people," King Hussein said.

Hussein pointed out.

King Hussein said he was also delighted to see this great mosque adjoined by an Islamic culture centre which, together with the mosque, forms a complex where religion and culture can be moulded and where faith in God can be strengthened."

King Hussein said on this occasion "Muslims look forward towards the day when the holy sites of Jerusalem are liberated from occupation so that Al Aqsa and the other sacred shrines can remain free and stand out as a symbol of faith for all Muslims on earth."

Addressing the celebration, Minister of Awqaf and Islamic Affairs Sheikh Abdul Aziz Al Khayyat outlined the importance of constructing mosques, saying that they have always been centres for launching Islamic Da'wa, teaching Koranic sciences, Islamic culture and for graduating leaders of the Islamic conquests and Muslim scholars.

Khayyat voiced hope that the new mosque will play its role in enhancing Islamic culture, fulfilling the message of the mosque and delivering the good word and advice, through its minbar (rostrum), the cultural centre, the Koran house and its library. Khayyat pointed out that the idea of setting up this mosque was initiated by King Hussein who allocated a plot of land for its construction in 1974, laid its foundation stone in 1982 and followed up on its construction stages.

He added that the mosque has three doors, which were called the Door of Peace, the Door of Shoura (consultation) and the Door of Mercy, to signal the principles that Islam advocates.

Khayyat noted the efforts made by His Royal Highness Prince Abdullah Ibn Al Hussein, Rifai, Sharif Zaid, Speaker of the Upper House of Parliament Ahmad Al Lawzi, King Hussein's Political Advisor Adnan Abu Odeh and senior civil and military officials.

The octagonal mosque's light-blue dome and twin minarets dominate the city skyline near the site near the parliament building.

Khayyat has said the mosque and its extensive facilities are designed to accommodate 10,000 worshippers. It will take over most state functions from the 67-year-old Hussein Mosque in bustling central Amman, the only other government-built mosque among the city's 430.

The new mosque was designed by West German architect Jan Cejka and Jordanians Ribhi Sohi and Hassan Nouri. Khayyat said last year the original plan had undergone numerous changes to rectify faults, including incorrect orientation of the Qiblah, or Niche, indicating the direction of Mecca.

project. King Hussein also received from Khayyat a copy of the Holy Koran and a gift on the occasion.

Arab League mediators appeal for ceasefire

20 more die as merciless bombardment hits Beirut

BEIRUT (AP) — At least 20 people died Wednesday as rival sides pounded east and west Beirut with rockets and other artillery for the fifth straight day.

In Damascus, Kuwait's foreign minister, head of an Arab League mediation team made a new call for a ceasefire to start at Wednesday midnight.

After a six-hour talk with Syrian President Hafez Assad, Sheikh Sabah Al Ahmad Al Sabah of Kuwait said "we appeal to all the warring parties to observe a ceasefire as of midnight." He did not say whether Assad had agreed to the truce.

Sabah also called for attacks on ports and airports to end and crossing points opened between east and west Beirut.

"We are a committee representing the entire Arab World and we put the historic responsibility upon each party who does not comply with this call."

In an interview earlier in the day Army Commander Gen. Michel Aoun signalled willingness to return to the situation before he imposed a blockade on opposition controlled Lebanese ports which set off the current round of fighting March 14.

Aoun told the London-based Mideast Mirror in a telephone interview teleaxed to the Associated Press in Bahrain that he would lift the blockade as long as the ports were not used to export drugs and arms. He called again for Syrian and Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon and said he would accept any other peacekeeping force.

Police put the toll at 20 killed and 68 wounded in the fierce exchanges that targeted residential areas.

That raised to 175 killed and 574 wounded the overall toll from the 29-day confrontation between Aoun's Falangist troops and an alliance of Syrian and Druze forces.

Police said most of the casualties were reported in west Beirut where shells fired by Falangist gunners slammed into three vegetable markets and the Barbir Hospital, one of the four major medical centres in the city's western sector.

A police spokesman said the Murr Tower, an unfinished 40-storey skyscraper used by Syrian troops in west Beirut as a base for snipers and artillery spotters, took several direct hits from 155-millimetre Howitzers.

The spokesman, who cannot be named in line with police rules, said there was an undetermined number of Syrian casualties. Syrian soldiers were seen evacuating casualties from the tall building. They shot their automatic rifles in the air to make way for the vehicles that raced to unknown destinations.

Also Wednesday, Jean-Francois Deniau, vice president of the Foreign Affairs Committee at the French National Assembly, arrived in Beirut to prevent him from meeting Aoun.

He told French radio from Beirut that French embassy staff had intercepted a telephone call in which a Syrian officer ordered the shelling of the ambassador's residence, where he is staying.

"We have had confirmation through an intercepted call that orders were given to fire on the residence to prevent me from fulfilling my mission, to prevent me from meeting Gen. Aoun," Deniau said.

Foreign Minister Roland Dumas earlier told the National Assembly that shells had landed about 100 metres from the embassy and had set fire to a petrol tank.

But Deniau told the Europe 1 radio station: "The building was targeting this morning and shells fell less than 20 metres away."

Deniau later drove in an armoured troop carrier to meet Aoun at the presidential palace in Baabda, target of heavy shelling. "In the name of France I solemnly condemn the bombardments striking the civilian populations of Beirut," Dumas told the National Assembly.

France said Wednesday it was sending two ships with relief supplies to Beirut to help civilians caught in the artillery battle.

Deniau braved the shelling to cross the Green Line dividing the city, to meet with Aoun's rival Acting Prime Minister Salim Al Hoss in west Beirut.

Crown Prince calls on southerners to return, take part in development

AQABA (Petra) — His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan Wednesday called on the inhabitants of the southern regions who had left their hometowns to return to the south and participate in its development.

The southern regions of Jordan account for nearly 50 per cent of the total area of the country and can absorb one third of the total amounts of investments, but unfortunately the area now is home for 10 per cent of the population, the Crown Prince said in an address to a meeting held here to assess the economic development process in the southern parts of the Kingdom, which includes the governorates of Karak and Tafilah and the district of Aqaba.

The southern regions of Jordan acquire a central location within the newly formed Arab Cooperation Council (ACC) and therefore should be developed economically and socially through various development schemes, the Crown Prince noted.

Developing the southern regions should be part of the all-out endeavour to implement the ACC objectives, Prince Hassan added.

He referred to the European Community (EC), which was established in 1957, and which, he said, took 35 years to reach the level at which its member countries can integrate, a process which is scheduled to take place in 1992.

Prince Hassan stressed the importance of the tourism sector in Aqaba which, he said, ought to attract investments of all kinds and draw attention from the public as well as the private sectors.

"Agriculture and industry are also of great importance and they too should be given due care in the general socio-economic development of the southern regions," Prince Hassan added.

In all this, he said, the private sector "can play a leading role and can increase investments." The Crown Prince referred to the recently established industries at Aqaba which, he said, have contributed to the general development.

At the outset of the meeting which was attended by Prime Minister Zaid Rifai and other officials, Minister of Planning Taher Kanaan outlined the objectives of the meeting and said that one important challenge facing Jordan now is the transfer of responsibility in socio-economic development from the public to the private sector.

A higher technical committee, charged with discussing projects for the south, submitted a list of priorities for the socio-economic development of the southern regions.

The four-point list referred to economic, mineral, social, economic, tourism, industrial, agricultural and services development.

"At present most attention is being fixed on industry and agriculture in the southern regions of the Kingdom, a process which is being taken over by the private sector."

The minister stressed the importance of creating income generating projects so as to absorb more unemployed people and create opportunities for more income for the country.

Israeli officer refuses help for injured Arab

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AP) — An Israeli army officer refusing to help a seriously wounded 14-year-old Palestinian in the head in clashes with Palestinian protesters in Gaza City as the Israeli occupation authorities freed nearly 340 detainees.

The newspaper published a front-page interview with the driver, an Arab from the Israeli bedouin village of Rahat, who said he remained on the roadside for hours, suffering burns on his hands and face, after his car caught fire when his gas line ruptured.

The driver, Yusef Al Dibsan, 24, told the newspaper that soldiers sent away drivers that stopped to offer first aid by telling them: "It's OK, he's Arab."

A military spokesman said the army was investigating the report.

Dibsan told Yedioth he was alone in the car and dragged himself out after the accident. A few minutes later an army vehicle stopped and an officer, seeing Dibsan was injured, called an ambulance and the fire department.

"He asked me questions and when I told him that I lived in Rahat (a bedouin town in the Negev Desert) he said, 'so you're an Arab,'" Dibsan said. "He moved away and I heard him cancelling the call for the ambulance and the fire squad," he said. "Because of my injuries I couldn't even beg him to evacuate me."

Dibsan said he was left lying on the roadside until a man from the farm where he works saw the flaming car. The man who helped, Shalom Anikah, told Yedioth he ignored soldiers' orders to go away.

"I saw a burning car, but the soldiers told me that it was an Arab's car and I should not go near it," said Anikah.

4 more youths hit by bullets as Israelis free 340 detainees

OCCUPIED TERRITORIES (Agencies) — Israeli troops Wednesday shot and seriously wounded a 14-year-old Palestinian in the head in clashes with Palestinian protesters in Gaza City as the Israeli occupation authorities freed nearly 340 detainees.

The newspaper published a front-page interview with the driver, an Arab from the Israeli bedouin village of Rahat, who said he remained on the roadside for hours, suffering burns on his hands and face, after his car caught fire when his gas line ruptured.

officials said. The release coincided with the start of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's crucial talks with Bush administration in Washington.

One freed detainee, Hamdi Arafat, 21, told reporters: "We know it was done for the media while Shamir is visiting Washington."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Rabin said freeing the detainees was "a gesture to show the residents we respect their religious beliefs," meaning Ramadan.

Israel is building about 5,000 Palestinians arrested during the uprising, including more than 1,000 political activists in detention without trial. In addition, more than 4,500 Arabs have been in jail since before the revolt for commando activities.

Israel has announced a series of goodwill gestures in the last two days, ostensibly to mark the start of Ramadan, just as Shamir began a difficult mission to explain in Washington Israel's refusal to talk to the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) or give back occupied Arab lands.

Defence Ministry officials authorised dozens of family reunifications for Palestinians whose spouses or children had been barred from residing in the occupied territories.

Mosque loudspeakers removed after broadcasting "incitement" were returned, some curfews were lifted and alleyways sealed to stop protesters were reopened.

But many of the 1.75 million Palestinians under occupation seemed unimpressed by the moves, saying they would not calm the uprising unless Israel addressed basic demands for self-determination and a Palestinian state.

One 13-year-old boy released in Gaza, Mahmoud Abu Kheyal, told reporters when asked whether his parents were angry with him for being arrested during protests: "I think they are proud of me."

At least 419 Palestinians have been killed in the uprising.

Qasem: U.S. shows new spirit on peace

AMMAN (R) — Jordan's foreign minister said on Wednesday the United States was showing a "new spirit" on a Middle East settlement and President Bush's statements showed he was serious about peace.

"This is a positive, clear American position that we feel points in a serious way at the major elements in the conflict — an end to the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza in return for guarantees of peace and security for the state of Israel and all other states in the region," Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Marwan Qasem said.

"We think it's a very important step that will have a positive impact on the whole region, including a major sector within Israeli society," he told Reuters in an interview.

Bush said after meeting Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak Monday that their common goals included Israeli security, the end of the Israeli occupation of territories seized in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war and the achievement of Palestinian rights.

Bush also said a properly structured international conference could play a useful role at the appropriate time.

His Majesty King Hussein, due in Washington later this month, has, like Mubarak, long called for an international conference under U.N. auspices to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, now in the U.S. capital for talks with Bush, flatly rejects the idea.

Qasem said he detected a "new spirit" in American statements on the Middle East, if not actual policy changes. This was confirmed by Washington's decision in December to open a dialogue with the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

He hoped Bush would leave Shamir in no doubt that a peace settlement required an end to the occupation and Palestinian self-determination. "That does not conflict with the security of all states in the region, including Israel," he said.

Qasem, 50, said the Arab World was offering Israel much more now than when Jordan and Egypt became the first Arab states to accept U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 in 1967.

It was an end to the state of belligerency. Now the Arabs are ready to enter a meaningful, constructive process that would lead to much more than that — a genuine peace for all, if and when Israel withdraws from the territories it occupied in 1967 and 1973," Qasem declared.

"This (Israeli withdrawal) is the major signal that will indicate that the peace process will come to fruition in a just and durable solution."

"Israel can no longer hide behind a negative Arab or Palestinian position. We have called the Israeli bluff of having a peace-loving attitude... and this is the moment of truth."

Qasem said the Lebanese must agree among themselves if they wanted the world to take them seriously.

"The most important thing is to stop any further deterioration, to have a ceasefire to save the Lebanese from more bloodshed and agonising experiences," Qasem, a member of the Arab League mediating committee on Lebanon, said.

(of)... elements that can re-compose Lebanon into a state built on reconciliation and understanding."

Asked whether pressures from Israel, Syria and Iraq were obstructing an understanding among Lebanese, he said: "I don't discount foreign influences in Lebanon... but the Lebanese cannot succumb to any outsider."

"They have to wake up to the fact that they must find a common denominator, a feeling of belonging to a country as their homeland that they want to promote and protect."

"This is a bare minimum for the Lebanese to show that they have a right to demand the serious attention of the Arabs and the world," he said.

Qasem said the committee, formed earlier this year, wanted to rehabilitate Lebanon's fractured state institutions. "This will involve election of a president, constitutional reform and rectification of a certain sense of injustice that some Lebanese factions have felt through the years, whether this is social, political, economic or psychological," he added.

Baker, Shamir hold 'useful, productive and friendly' talks

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir presented Secretary of State James Baker with proposals in solve problems in the Middle East Wednesday, and Baker said he was encouraged.

Although details were not immediately disclosed, Shamir had said last week in Israel he would propose that Palestinians hold elections to choose leaders for negotiations over the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"I feel we have started a very serious discussion," Shamir said after the two-hour meeting at the State Department. Baker called it "a very productive, useful, friendly discussion."

suggestions that "were very encouraging."

On his arrival, Shamir pledged to work with the United States in a search for new peace openings. "We are among friends," he said. In an arrival statement, Shamir said he hoped his visit would open "vistas" to peace while he works with U.S. officials "in mutual understanding and respect."

His aim in the election proposal is to find leaders other than from the PLO to negotiate some form of self-rule for the 1.7 million Arabs in the Israeli-occupied territories.

The 73-year-old prime minister refuses to negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO), he told a conference of Jewish-American organisation leaders that sitting with the PLO "will bring disaster."

While Shamir has withheld many of the details until he saw Baker Wednesday and President George Bush Thursday, he apparently intends to hold the elections only after the 15½-month uprising subsides.

The Bush administration is seeking a more immediate change in the situation. And yet, a U.S. official, briefing reporters Tuesday at the White House on the visit, said "We want to listen to what Prime Minister Shamir has to say how the peace process can be moved forward, but I don't want to prejudice what, in fact, he is going to tell the president."

Kabul rocket bombardment kills 6

KABUL (Agencies) — Rockets smashed into Kabul for the second successive day Wednesday killing six people and injuring 23, police said.

Two rockets fired from the hills outside the Afghan capital exploded in the city, mowing people down with a lethal spray of shrapnel, witnesses said.

One landed in a park, killing an old man and a child, and the other in a shopping street, destroying a cigarette shop, killing its owner and killing or maiming shoppers.

Six rockets hit a northern residential area of Kabul Tuesday, killing at least six people and possibly as many as 12.

The attacks on the capital follow a lull of several weeks and residents fear that with the advent of spring the Mujahedeen rebels fighting to topple the government may be stepping up their campaign to demoralise Kabul's two million inhabitants.

In New Delhi, Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze was quoted as saying Pakistan is risking its reputation by backing Afghan rebels despite accords that led to the departure of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

"Islamabad has embarked on a road of actual refusal from observing the obligations under the accords, sanctified by the name and authority of the U.N.," he said in an interview published in the Indian Patriot newspaper Wednesday.

"Any government should think twice before challenging the international community in such a way and before resorting to such a gross violation of international law," he said.

"It puts at stake too much — the reputation of the country, on whose word one could rely, as well as the future of its relations with the countries of the region," Shevardnadze said.

More than 100,000 Soviet troops left Afghanistan by Feb. 15 under Geneva accords brokered by the United Nations one year ago.

Under the accords, Pakistan and Moscow pledged not to interfere in Afghanistan.

"This obligation is openly and flagrantly violated," Shevardnadze said.

Moscow contends that by continuing to supply Afghan rebel Mujahedeen from its own territory, Pakistan is in breach of the agreements and has said Islamabad risks war with Afghanistan, where the government is holding out without Soviet troops.

Shevardnadze did not repeat that implied threat in his interview with the Patriot.

"Pakistan has quite a few big and complicated problems. By its defiant policies towards Afghanistan it will only aggravate these problems and will put itself in an even more difficult position," he said, however.

Kabul spy trial

Meanwhile Pakistan's Foreign Ministry dismissed the trial of two alleged Pakistani spies by the Afghan government Wednesday as a "desperate ploy."

A ministry spokesman told reporters at a briefing that Pakistan viewed Kabul's attempts to involve the United Nations Security Council in the Afghan conflict as merely propaganda.

Kabul has said the two men were going on trial in a public hearing to prove that Pakistan was actively helping rebel guerrillas inside Afghanistan.

But the Pakistani spokesman said the Afghan government had given no proof that the two men, captured near the southern city of Kandahar in March, were Pakistanis at all.

"You can catch any two people and put them on television and claim they are Pakistanis," he said. "Basically this is a desperate ploy to try and prove that we are involved."

The spokesman reiterated Pakistan's denial that it was involved militarily in the 10-year-old civil war in its north-western neighbour.

"Pakistan has never interfered with what goes on in Afghanistan," he said.

The Soviet-backed Kabul government says Pakistani militia and army officers are fighting alongside the rebels laying siege to the eastern city of Jalalabad.

Some rebels say privately Pakistani military intelligence agency is active in advising them and controlling the supply of Western and other arms. But they deny any regular Pakistani units are involved in the fighting.

U.N. appeal

The Kabul government called Monday for an urgent meeting of the U.N. Security Council to discuss what it described as Pakistani military aggression.

Egyptian artists caught in drug bust

CAIRO (R) — Four top Egyptian stage and television performers are being investigated as part of a nationwide drive against drug abuse, police said Wednesday.

A spokesman for the Interior Ministry's anti-narcotics bureau said three singers and a famous comic were found smoking hashish in a luxury Cairo apartment Tuesday.

"They were arrested and questioned," he said. One was held in custody and the others were released on bail pending further investigation.

News of the arrests and investigation was front-page news in all major Cairo newspapers Wednesday.

The use of narcotics is illegal in Egypt. Those convicted face stiff fines and prison terms from five years to life.

Last month, an Egyptian court rejected a British woman's appeal against a 25-year prison sentence for smuggling heroin concealed in a wooden elephant. Maureen Paleschi, 51, from Cleveland in northeast England, said she did not know the drugs were in the elephant which she said an Egyptian friend had given her as a present in Karachi.

The arrests of the entertainers highlights a huge campaign to curb trafficking and persuade Egyptian youths not to try heroin, cocaine and hashish on sale in Cairo's backstreets.

Posters with skull and crossbones, warning of the dangers of drug abuse plaster the Cairo tenement houses of dealers and users.

The police raid has shown that Egypt's multi-million dollar entertainment business, where wealthy stars enjoy exotic lifestyles far from the poverty of many of their fans, was not immune from the government's anti-drug offensive.

Among the noted entertainers pulled in by the police was Ahmad Kahlawi, 35, a singer of religious songs. He is being held for further questioning, police said.

Three others found in the hashish-smoke filled apartment were Emad Abdul Halim, 29, tall singer of love songs, Nemat Mustapha, 24, the showbusiness songstress known as Sail — both household names in Egypt — and comedian Sayed Zayyan, 45.

All three were freed on bail ranging from 1,000 to 2,000 Egyptian pounds ($400 to $800).

A fifth suspect, identified by police as Eid Darwish, 45, a merchant, was also released on bail.

Zayyan failed to turn up for Tuesday night's performance in a current stage production in the fashionable neighbourhood of Zamalek, a theatre worker told Reuters.

The government has said it would soon draft new legislation increasing the penalties for drug offences.

Psychiatrists estimate two million of Egypt's 54 million people are addicted to heroin or cocaine.

Iraq vows retaliation is attacked

BAGHDAD (Agencies) — Iraq, whose nuclear reactor was destroyed by Israel in 1981, said Wednesday it would strongly retaliate against any future attacks by the Jewish state.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman told the Iraq News Agency (INA): "Iraq will retaliate in an appropriate way to any Israeli aggression which may take place under distorted justifications. Any aggression will not pass without punishment."

Rafael Eitan, an Israeli army chief at the time of the air raid on the Iraqi reactor, recently said that Israel should destroy the facility if Baghdad rebuilt it.

The Iraqi spokesman's remarks followed unconfirmed Western press reports that Baghdad was developing nuclear weapons.

The spokesman said that among "the distorted Zionist attempts to undermine Iraq's reputation were those claiming that Iraq was manufacturing nuclear warheads."

He said the Israeli campaign came at a time when the Arab peace assault was being stepped up to uncover Israeli crimes aimed at battering world peace efforts.

During Iraq's eight-year war with neighbouring Iran, Baghdad hit Tehran with missiles equipped with conventional warheads. Their 850-kilometre range showed that Iraq could hit Israel.

Israel radio station bans intifada song

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AP) — The army radio station has restricted broadcasts of a newly released Israeli rock song about the Palestinian uprising because its subject matter is "sensitive," an army official said Wednesday.

The song called the Flood 15 Behind US, written by Nurit Galron, accuses Israelis in the coastal city of Tel Aviv of showing indifference toward Arab suffering during the nearly 16-month rebellion in the occupied territories.

The military station played the song several times before Station Commander Nahman Shai ordered it taken off the air and played in the future only with his express consent, two Israeli news dailies, Hadashot and Maariv, reported Wednesday.

An official in Shai's office confirmed the decision in a telephone interview.

"Yes it is an unusual step, but we are also a military framework and some consider this to be sensitive because it discusses the intifada," or uprising, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

ity in keeping with military regulations.

Hadashot quoted Shai as criticising the song as "a glorification of the subject, with lines that are hard to accept." Part of the song's lyrics, as quoted by Hadashot, are:

There is a country of stones and firebombs,
And there is a Tel Aviv on fire with night clubs and lewdness.
There is a country of rebels where the wounded are being bandaged,
And there is a Tel Aviv that makes merry with food and drink.

No, don't tell me about a little girl who lost an eye,
It only makes me feel bad.
I don't feel like hearing about people oppressed or tortured.

I don't care, what is happening in the territories...

We will make love and live our lives. Tel Aviv is life.
Last year Israeli radio stations restricted broadcast of another protest song about Israel's handling of the uprising called Shooting and Crying, by rock star G. Hymen.

Israeli leadership knew of spy-book

WASHINGTON (AP) — A new book on the espionage of Jonathan J. Pollard concludes it had a spy in Washington but probably did not know the details. The disclosures in Terrorism of Lies, to be published next month, could embarrass Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir who arrives for an official visit here Wednesday.

Pollard, an intelligence analyst with the U.S. Navy, is serving a life sentence for selling Israel thousands of secrets. Israel has maintained it was an unauthorized rogue operation.

Pollard's November 1985 arrest and subsequent discoveries about the extent of his spying strained U.S.-Israel relations and stirred doubts among American Jews about their loyalty to Israel.

In his book, Jerusalem Post correspondent Wolf Blitzer sets out to show that "at least one or two" of Israel's senior leadership probably knew that a senior intelligence operative named Rafi Eitan "was running a spy in Washington. They are simply too experienced in these kinds of matters not to have known or suspected."

Among those leaders were then-Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Yitzhak Rabin, both with broad intelligence experience, and Shamir himself, who was once a senior operative of the Mossad spy agency.

"But even if they suspected that a spy was in place in Washington, they almost certainly did not know his name was Pollard... or any other specific details of the operation," Blitzer wrote.

Blitzer, who has been covering the case since the day Pollard showed up at the Israeli embassy with his wife and cat asking for asylum, said an Israeli investigator compared Eitan's decision to keep his bosses in the dark to the Iran-contra affair.

The book surmises that Eitan and other Pollard handlers "apparently assumed, arrogantly and recklessly, that they would not get caught."

In a chapter entitled "the Cover-Up: Code Name 'Siren,' Blitzer recounts how Israel's government scrambled to disavow knowledge of the espionage and give the appearance of full cooperation with American investigators without cooperating to the full extent.

Jay Pollard

Particularly he cites the decision to keep from the Americans the name and role of Air Force Col. Aviem Sella, who recruited Pollard in 1984 and was subsequently indicted. "The high level decision to cover up Sella's role was understandable but stupid," Blitzer wrote.

To make sure the American investigation team that came to Israel would not learn about Sella or ask to interview him, Israeli authorities spirited him out of the country to West Germany, Blitzer wrote. They falsely dated his passport several days earlier to make it look like he left before the team arrived, according to Blitzer.

"West Germany was selected because its customs officials do not routinely stamp entry dates into visiting Israeli passports," Blitzer said.

American counter-intelligence experts became suspicious when they learned that Pollard was tasked by his handlers with obtaining specific documents which they thought Israel could only have known about if someone else was giving it information.

MIDDLE EAST NEWS IN BRIEF

Nordic ministers discuss Mideast

AMMAN (Agencies) — At their meeting in Thorshavn March 30-31, 1989, the Nordic Foreign Ministers discussed the situation in the Middle East. The ministers were encouraged by the fact that the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) leader Yasser Arafat, at the U.N. General Assembly in Geneva last December, had accepted Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, recognised the right of Israel to exist and explicitly renounced all forms of terrorism. The ministers were also encouraged by the fact that the way had been paved for the beginning of a dialogue between the U.S. and the PLO. In this way steps towards a peaceful and just solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict had been taken, which deserved a speedy and constructive reply from Israel. The ministers stressed the importance of establishing direct contacts between Israel and PLO. The ministers reiterated their full support for convening an international peace conference under the auspices of the United Nations and with the participation of the five permanent members of the Security Council as well as all parties directly involved. The basis for the conference should be Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which recognise Israel's right to exist within secure and recognised borders, and the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination with all that this implies. An international conference still appears to be the best way in which to achieve a permanent solution to the Middle East conflict. The ministers reiterated their grave concern about the continued oppressive measures by the Israeli authorities against the Palestinians in the occupied territories. These measures are clearly in violation of both international law and human rights, and they widen the gap of distrust between the peoples in the area and add to the Palestinian people's sense of disappointment and frustration.

Stoltenberg talks with Shara

DAMASCUS (R) — Norwegian Foreign Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg discussed ways of pushing forward the peace process in the Middle East with his Syrian counterpart Farouq Al Shara, diplomats said. They said that Stoltenberg, who arrived from Jordan Tuesday, and Shara expressed support for holding an international peace conference under the auspices of the United Nations to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict. The Syrian foreign minister affirmed that a just and comprehensive peace in the region should be based on Israeli withdrawal from all occupied Arab territories and recognition of the Palestinian people's rights.

'Moscow sold Libya bombers'

NEW YORK (R) — U.S. administration officials say the Soviet Union has sold Libya high-performance bombers and airborne refuelling ability, the New York Times reported Wednesday. The deal, involving as many as 15 of the Sukhoi-24D airplanes which can fly 1,300 kilometres round-trip without refuelling, would greatly enhance Libya's ability to hit targets in Israel and beyond, the newspaper said. The Defence Department had no comment on the report Tuesday evening. U.S. officials were puzzled by the deal, which also included training of Libyan pilots to fly the SU-24 bombers, because it was at odds with Kremlin leader Mikhail Gorbachev's proclaimed intention for the Soviet Union to take a more conciliatory role in regional conflicts, the Times said. It said the Bush administration must now decide whether to protest against the sale publicly or raise the question privately in talks between Secretary of State James Baker and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze next month.

Turkey arrests women over Christ film

ISTANBUL (R) — Turkish police arrested two U.S. women in Istanbul as they tried to protest against a film festival screening of "The Last Temptation of Christ." U.S. and Turkish officials said Wednesday. A U.S. consular official said police had not given full details about the names or charges against the two women but their release was expected shortly. Istanbul police confirmed the arrests, which occurred late Tuesday at the festival's second screening of the Martin Scorsese film, which shows scenes of Jesus Christ fantasising about making love. About 200 Muslim demonstrators marched in protest against the first screening of the film earlier Tuesday, manhandling one policeman. No arrests were made then.

Syria, Cyprus sign drug pact

DAMASCUS (R) — Syria and Cyprus have agreed to cooperate in fighting the trade in narcotics, officials said Wednesday. An agreement was signed following talks Tuesday between visiting Cypriot Interior Minister Christodoulos Veniamin and his Syrian counterpart Mohammad Harba. Under the terms of the agreement their ministries will coordinate police moves against drug smugglers and dealers, and swap information on other areas of concern. Veniamin, who arrived in Damascus Sunday, had talks with Syrian President Hafez Al Assad Tuesday on developments in the region and ways of promoting bilateral cooperation.

Maltese freighter found off UAE

BAHRAIN (R) — The wreck of a Maltese freighter reported missing several days ago has been found off the coast of the United Arab Emirates (UAE) but there were no signs of the 20 Asian crew, the ship's agents said Wednesday. A spokesman for the Dubai-based agents Al Gath Al Ghanim Al Qutub told Reuters an offshore Abu Dhabi oil company found the 2,958-tonne Rahim Three in 15 feet of water a mile off the Emirate's Umm Shif Reef. "We were notified by the Abu Dhabi Marine Operating Company they had discovered the wreck of this morning," the spokesman said. "They said there is no sign of life and their divers are inspecting the ship's hull for damage. We have no idea what has happened to the crew," he added. The nationality of crew was unknown, but they were believed to be Pakistanis or Indians, the agents said. The Bombay-bound vessel lashed with scrap metal disappeared after leaving Doha last Thursday.

Queen Noor visits Amman Municipality

AMMAN (J.T.) — Her Majesty Queen Noor Wednesday visited the Municipality of Greater Amman where the Queen was briefed on the municipality's projects aimed at highlighting the archaeological, historical and cultural significance of the capital.

The Queen was received upon arrival by the Mayor of Greater Amman, Abdul Raouf Al Rawabdeh who thanked Her Majesty for her continued support and encouragement of the efforts of the municipality.

The municipality is currently working on the design and execution of four main projects which include a political life museum, Amman Citadel development, landscaping of Al Qsour slopes as well as the designs for a new municipality of Greater Amman building.

The Political Life Museum is going to be established within the old parliament building, where the story of modern Jordan will be told. The aim of the museum is to expose the important political events through the lives of those who contributed to them and to inform the young about the cultural development of the country by enlightening them about the roots of the Kingdom's prosperity.

The political events will be divided into a chronological order related to the Hashemite kings starting with Al Hussein Ibn Ali, Abdullah Ibn Hussein, King Talal Ibn Abdullah and His Majesty King Hussein Ibn Talal.

The Citadel development project will focus on preserving the most important archaeological site in the capital, the Citadel and the Umayyad palace. The site also contains Ammonite, Hellenistic, Roman and Islamic remains.

The objectives of the project include the completion of archaeological excavation and renovation to prepare the site for tourism, and the construction of necessary services and infrastructure such as motels, restaurants and libraries. The main concept behind the development of Al Qsour slopes is to minimise structural work, conserve the slopes topography and improve the visual link between the road and the area by planting trees and shrubs.

The new Municipality of Greater Amman building will be constructed to allow harmony with the municipality's role in society and its operational duties. The architecture of the building would symbolise the society's heritage. The building will be constructed at the centre of a 100 dunum public park.

At the end of her visit, the Queen praised the efforts of the municipality and its continued endeavours to provide the citizens of the capital with basic services and beautifying the city of Amman.

The Queen later visited the old parliament building where she was also briefed on the planned museum project.

Upon directives from His Majesty the King:

Jordan sends relief supplies to S. Yemen

AMMAN (J.T.) — Jordan Wednesday dispatched relief supplies to South Yemen where thousands of people were rendered homeless as a result of floods, described by news reports as the worst in 50 years.

A military plane-load of food, medical supplies and medical appliances weighing altogether 12 tonnes left for Aden upon directives from His Majesty King Hussein, according to an official announcement here Tuesday.

Health Minister Zuhair Malhas, who saw off the mission, said that the gift was in response to a call by the South Yemeni government, and in an expression of solidarity with Arab brothers in adversity.

Malhas said that Jordan was willing also to send a team of medical officers and nurses to the flood stricken country to offer assistance as needed.

South Yemen is the second

Arab country to receive relief supplies from Jordan after Sudan which was hit by floods, drought and famine over the past few years.

South Yemen had appealed for international aid after the floods, caused by a week of torrential rain in the normally arid regions, swept away hundreds of houses and inundated thousands of acres of farmland. Initial reports said that at least 20 people were killed and tens of thousands were made homeless.

An official of the emergency relief committee said that the authorities were struggling to reopen roads and communications with the stricken areas.

Several Arab states including Saudi Arabia have already sent in relief supplies, tents and blankets. South Yemen which has a population of about 2.5 million is one of the world's poorest countries.

Along with Malhas, the mission was seen off at the airport by senior government officials.

Aid to Sudan

Meanwhile it was announced that a Jordanian vessel loaded with relief supplies arrived in Port Said in Egypt Wednesday on its way to Sudan. The supplies were sent as a gift from the Jordanian people to the Sudanese victims of floods, drought and famine. The vessel is loaded with clothing, building materials to be used in the construction of homes for the Sudanese victims.

According to the announcement through the National Jordanian Committee for Solidarity with Sudan which is working under the directives of His Majesty King Hussein and His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan who chairs the committee.

Patriarch of Jerusalem inaugurates Salt church

Patriarch Sabbah

AMMAN (Petra) — The Roman Catholic Patriarch of Jerusalem Michel Sabbah has inaugurated a new church in Salt where he said mass at a religious ceremony attended by a large congregation and invited guests including Balqa Governor Mijhem Al Khreisla.

The patriarch's sermon at the mass centered on Christian-Muslim unity which, he said, has been maintained in the Kingdom under the Hashemite family since the creation of the Kingdom earlier this century.

The patriarch expressed the Roman Catholic church's appreciation and gratitude to Mr. Anis Al Muasher, a former minister and businessman from Salt, for financing the project.

The mayor's deputy Mr. Mousa Al Dahbas delivered a speech, voicing the local community's appreciation to the Roman Catholic mission for its valuable services to Salt since the middle of the 19th century, especially in the educational fields.

According to Roman Catholic priest Jihad Shweihat, the old church was set up in Salt in 1869.

The patriarch was accorded an official welcome ceremony and a reception after the mass attended by notable personalities, government department directors and other key figures in Salt and the neighbouring regions.

U.S. increases agricultural import assistance to Jordan

AMMAN (J.T.) — March 16, the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) increased credit guarantee coverage for sales of U.S. agricultural commodities to Jordan by US $25 million. The total allocation for Jordan now totals US $65 million, U.S. Agency for International Development announced.

The increase is part of the Commodity Credit Corporation's (CCC) Intermediate Export Credit Guarantee Programme for Fiscal Year 1989 (October 1, 1988 - September 30, 1989). This action increases the allocation for wheat from US $25 to 35 million and adds US $15 million for rice purchases. The programme also includes US $10 million for the purchase of U.S. corn and an undesignated US $5 million which may be utilised for any of the above specified commodities. All sales under this programme must be registered by September 30, 1989 and exported by December 31, 1989.

Rice and corn will be made available at commercial market terms. Wheat purchases will be subsidised under the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Export Enhancement Programme (EEP). Because of the EEP wheat initiative, Jordan's Ministry of Supply will realise a nearly US $4 million savings.

USDA has also made available to Jordan US $13 million in short-term credit guarantees for private sector imports of lumber, plywood and processed food products.

Disease cases on the increase

CPF to open kindergarten for cerebral palsy children

AMMAN (Petra, J.T.) — The Cerebral Palsy Foundation (CPF) is currently studying the prospect of opening a kindergarten and a school to provide special education to children with cerebral palsy cases, according to CPF Director Fakhri Bilbeisi.

Bilbeisi said that the projected school which will help pave the way for the victims to join normal schools was expected to cost between JD 15,000 and JD 20,000 annually.

He said that the CPF is also studying the possibility of opening additional centres in different governorates to work alongside the present five centres.

He said that the number of children with cerebral palsy is on the increase and noted that the five centres last year provided assistance and treatment to 683 new cases against 547 in 1987. Bilbeisi added that the number of children treated by the CPF since its establishment in 1977 was 4,000.

Specialists at the five centres located in Amman, Zarqa, Irbid, Aqaba and Salt provide guidance to the families of the children with cerebral palsy cases on means of treatment and of the children and continue to distribute pamphlets and booklets with instructions to deal with cerebral palsy.

In an earlier interview with the Jordan Times Bilbeisi said that the CPF needs at least JD 150,000 in annual expenses and added that there were plans to open new centres in Karak, Tafleeh and Ma'an which require additional funds.

In addition to treatment and advice, Bilbeisi said, the CPF centres provide special equipment to help in the process of children rehabilitation.

Enforce the ban

APRIL 7 marks non-smoking day in Jordan and elsewhere in compliance with the recommendation of the World Health Organisation. Jordan has already taken many measures to ban smoking in public places. Last month alone saw the introduction of additional legislative action to prohibit smoking in all sorts of public places as well as impose penalties on violators. All ministries and public and private institutions were called upon to disseminate and enforce the new legal guidelines. Yet in practice, smoking goes on even in some public places, that includes board rooms, within the very ministries charged with the task of educating the people against smoking. It seems that what we need in Jordan is more than legislation and theoretical penalties to combat the habit of smoking. The full weight of the prime minister himself is urgently needed to give credence to the new rules by issuing a circular to all ministries and public bodies to give full faith and credit to the new rules. It seems that thus far, our authorities have taken the new policy against smoking with a grain of salt as illustrated by the continuation of the habit of smoking in public places before the very eyes of those who are charged with the task of enforcing the new law. Only through the intervention of the prime minister there could be hope to convince the various shades of officialdom that the government means what it has legislated and that non-smoking in public meeting places will be strictly enforced.

The minister of health is also called upon to prosecute the first case against violators. Surely since the introduction of the new rules, Jordan has yet to hear about a violator who has been penalised as called for in our law books. Such cases against violators should serve as case studies to which much publicity should be given. Without such additional action-oriented measures to complement the new legislation against smoking, the new rules would remain ink on paper. May then the non-smokers and all those who genuinely care about the health of Jordanians expect something more than seminars and laws to stem the dangerous habit of smoking? The observance of the 7th of April as the non-smoking day in Jordan would not be complete without such additional complimentary steps.

ARABIC PRESS EDITORIALS

Al Ra'i daily newspaper on Wednesday tackled the Bush-Mubarak meeting in Washington which it said resulted in full agreement on the need to end the Israeli occupation of Palestinian land. The paper said that the meeting showed beyond doubt that the United States supported the convening of an international conference to end the Arab-Israeli conflict but that procedural matters still stand in the way. The major stumbling block, the paper added, is Shamir and his government which refuses to talk to the PLO or attend an international conference... Shamir, who is visiting the United States soon, will have to present his government's views and whatever ideas he has in mind can never change the fact that his government is adamant in its position and its persistence on pursuing its goals in the Arab land, the paper noted. What is required now, the paper said, is a U.S. pressure on Israel to accept the conference idea and the will of the international community so that peace can be established in our region.

Al Dustour daily said in its editorial that the eyes of the Middle Eastern people are now turned towards the American capital where the Bush administration is holding meetings with leaders of the Middle Eastern countries involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict. The paper noted that the meetings clearly manifest a true interest in the Middle East on the part of the United States and point to the seriousness of American diplomatic activity, designed to help the two parties end the conflict. This is clearly demonstrated not only in the meetings as such but in the statements of George Bush following his initial meeting with President Mubarak, the paper noted. It said that Bush made it clear that the United States supports the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and will seek an end to Israeli occupation. Indeed this is a very favourable development and a new trend which can only help bring an end to the Middle East conflict, the paper added. It said that the United States now has a historic opportunity to play a major role in bringing peace to the Middle East.

Sawt Al Shaah daily newspaper said that the Mubarak-Bush meetings in Washington reflect the seriousness of the American position and U.S. genuine moves towards establishing peace in the Middle East. The paper said that the American president's statement about the need to implement U.N. Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 and to help the Palestinians gain their legitimate rights reflects a genuine orientation towards the establishment of a lasting peace. What we understand now, the paper said, is that the United States backs a total Israeli withdrawal from the occupied West Bank and the Gaza Strip but we expect more from the U.S. administration — to back up its stand with deeds rather than words. What is needed now, the paper said, is a genuine and practical response to the PLO's stand which was openly supportive of the idea of peace and an end to all forms of conflict in the area.

Israel's flagrant abuse of Palestinian economy

By Hisham Awartani

THE ECONOMIC collapse in the West Bank and Gaza Strip in recent months has attracted unusual attention in the Israeli and international news media and, for various reasons, has caused mounting concern to many on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The stories in the Israeli media seem to imply that the economic crash in both territories is only a recent phenomenon, and that it is more or less self-inflicted by the Palestinians as the cost of their intifada. Very few Israelis — there are some — have raised questions about whether Israeli economic practices in the occupied territories may have contributed to the pressure that led to the intifada.

Furthermore, there does not seem to be any realistic insight into the long-term consequences of the present suffering in the cause of peace, which, at least in theory, is a highly cherished priority on the agenda of all sides. It is important to point out, up front, that the roots of economic deterioration in the West Bank and Gaza Strip go back long before the outbreak of the intifada. That may sound like a surprise to most casual observers who have been bombarded for many years with tales of spectacular growth in the economy of the two territories and in the living standards of their residents.

It is true, as a matter of fact, that for nearly two decades the West Bank and Gaza Strip witnessed a pronounced rise in growth rates and living standards. But one does not have to be a professional economist to suspect that such achievements might have been underlain by transformations of a profoundly adverse nature.

The economy of the territories, for instance, was subordinated to that of Israel in a model of dependency that is much worse than typical models commonly reviewed in economic literature.

This subordination permitted the emergence of excessive consumerism, a development viewed by many Palestinian activists with great concern, not only because it reflects unfounded affluence but also because it aggravates the vulnerability of the Palestinian society to political pressure.

Superficial affluence during the 1970s concealed serious transformations in the local productive base, of which the following are some disturbing examples:

— Agriculture has lost much of its relative weight in the national economy. Its share in gross domestic product (GDP) dropped by more than one third and its share in the labour force declined by nearly 50 per cent. Not surprisingly, rural areas have become a reservoir of cheap labour, tapped gainfully by Israeli firms. The area under active cultivation (including natural pasture) has decreased by 21 per cent.

Industry has fared no better. Its share of the GDP remained at its pre-occupation level of about 8-10 per cent, and it employed around 16 per cent of the labour force. Growth in industry is confined largely to industrial branches that have flourished as a result of peripheral subordination to Israeli industrial firms.

Because of retarded growth in the local economic base, migration of workers to neighbouring labour markets, mainly in Israel, has become the panacea for economic survival. Remittances from emigrant labourers constitute the backbone of the national economy, so much so that their GDP share exceeded (in some years) that of agriculture and industry combined.

Unemployment among the Palestinian elite has become a national hazard. A study conducted in 1985 revealed that only 15 per cent of the annual crop of graduates succeeded in finding stable employment locally. The rest either remained redundant or sought employment in Israel.

It is true that achieving genuine economic growth in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is obstructed by numerous deep-rooted constraints — such as scarcity of resources and the small size of local markets. But many of the distortions that characterised the Palestinian economy over the past 22 years came about as a direct result of the occupation authorities' premeditated policies.

You do not have to subscribe to a grand conspiracy theory to conclude that Israeli economic policies in the West Bank and Gaza Strip were laid down after Israeli interests were carefully weighed against those of the local Palestinians. Reading through the records, Israeli interests pursued through economic means can be identified as follows:

— Expediting emigration to the furthest limit.
— Gaining control over the maximum of land and water resources.
— Maintaining the occupied territories as a captive market for the ailing Israeli economy.
— Drawing surplus cheap Palestinian labour into the Israeli labour market.

— Using economic decisions to enforce a carrot-and-stick policy.
— Undermining independent economic development to pre-empt the viability of a future Palestinian state.

Achieving these objectives was entrusted to the civil administration in the West Bank and Gaza, which is staffed with Israelis, most of them recruited from corresponding departments in Israel. Each department in the civil administration headquarters is headed by an officer invested with the duties and legal status of a minister.

Planning in all development-related departments has been routinely "coordinated" with corresponding Israeli institutions. And if anyone is in doubt about whose interests underlie the planning process, the answer is provided by Rabin's vow that "there will be no development in the territories initiated by the Israeli government, and no permits given for expanding agriculture or industry that may compete with the state of Israel."

Exploitative planning for 22 years has undoubtedly drawn its heavy toll, as evidenced by the track record of Israeli planners in the West Bank and Gaza Strip: — Employment potential in both territories has declined so sharply that emigration absorbs about two thirds of the natural population growth (about 15,000 annually).

— Well over 50 per cent of all West Bank land area is under Israeli control.

— Under the hypocritical premise that water resources in the West Bank should be shared "fairly" by both legitimate owners, Palestinians and Israelis, the latter exploit about 70 per cent of the West Bank's usable reserves, and the Palestinians are left with only 30 per cent.

— By restructuring bilateral trade so that Israeli produce is permitted free access to the markets of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, as compared to the selective flow of goods in the opposite direction, Israel managed in 1987 to achieve a surplus of $802 million vis-a-vis both territories, including East Jerusalem.

Israeli policies bearing on the West Bank and Gaza Strip economies have taken a sharp turn because of the intifada. Following the failure of military measures to quell the Palestinian uprising, the Israeli authorities seem to have decided to mobilise all available means for the explicit objective of maximising the suffering of the Palestinian residents. They apparently hope that at some point the Palestinians will realise that the cost of the intifada outweighs its anticipated gains.

To that end, the lives of Palestinian residents have been linked in countless ways to the district officer of the Israeli civil administration. Every adult resident has to make the pilgrimage to those offices every time he seeks to conduct the bits and pieces of his normal life. Needless to emphasise, every signature he is asked to collect on his papers — and there are many — costs him time, humiliation, and sometimes exorbitant fees.

To complement other restrictive measures, the Israeli authorities decided to tighten the economic belts. This they managed to achieve swiftly by imposing draconian sanctions such as the following:

— Tax rates and collection harassments were escalated to the point where many firms chose to quit or scale down their operations to a minimum.

— Export permits to Jordan and Israel were denied for such major items as melons, vegetables, grapes and building stones.

— Regulations concerning the transfer of funds have been severely tightened, basically forbidding the entry of more than 200 Jordanian dinars per incoming traveller or bank transaction. This arbitrary restriction has greatly undermined economic activity, and has also made life very difficult for the great number of families who, in effect, subsist on remittances they receive from relatives.

— Long curfews and sieges have entailed far-reaching consequences for all economic sectors, especially agriculture. A recent study involving a sample of eight villages put the cumulative loss inflicted as a consequence of punitive measures during the first 10 months of the intifada at $6.5m.

"There will be no development in the territories initiated by the Israeli government, and no permits given for expanding agriculture or industry that may compete with the state of Israel." — Rabin

— For unclear reasons, all car owners were required to change the plates of their cars, paying in the meantime an additional fee (nicknamed "intifada Tax") amounting to NIS 200-500 per car. With more than 62,000 vehicles in the West Bank and 25,000 in the Gaza Strip, the amount of shekels required for this purpose was certainly an important reason for the predicament of the Jordanian dinar in the occupied territories.

— Punitive fines are imposed on parents for offences committed by their minors. The naive intent is to enlist all members in the family in the effort to help restrain their "stray" son.

The list of economic pressures is too long and too subtle to be fully exposed here. Nonetheless, one should admit that if those measures were devised to make the life of Palestinians as difficult as possible, their authors can congratulate themselves for a job well done.

Yes, the amount of suffering inflicted on Palestinians in the territories has reached alarming levels, with no remembered parallel in recent history. But if the architects of that suffering expect that they can thus quell the intifada or serve the cause of peace — as they evidently do — they are grossly mistaken.

History is loaded with examples of the failure of economic sanctions in efforts to twist the arms of governments or dampen the will of people to fight for their freedom. Far from some Israelis' expectations, inflicting more suffering on the Palestinians will only aggravate bitterness and widen the rift between mainstream camps on both sides.

It is ironic and certainly tragic to see that the architects of Israeli policies in the West Bank and Gaza Strip seem to fail to understand, or probably refuse to believe, that what Palestinians are fighting for is simply to restore their rights, as those rights are most modestly defined.

In their struggle for their rights, the Palestinians have forged a great amount of determination and settled to such a relaxed posture that they are able to stretch their tolerance and patience far beyond ordinary limits. So, instead of causing more agony and bitterness, as if not enough has been generated, the Israeli authorities have to realise that coercion and economic sanctions will solve no problem.

They should understand, once and for all, that the cornerstone for attaining peace and gaining recognition in this part of the world lies in resolving their conflict with the Palestinian people. Irrespective of tactical political manoeuvres or occasional resort to military might, peace with the Palestinians can be achieved only on the basis of justice and mutual respect.

In the area of economics, justice means a lot. First and foremost, it means that the Israeli authorities should perform the moral act of surrendering authority over the economy of the West Bank and Gaza Strip to its legitimate owners. The whole world, and most Israelis, find it difficult to understand how Israel goes on abusing and exploiting the economy of another nation with which it supposedly aspires to live in peace.

Friends Girls School centennial message

THIS centennial year may see the death of Friends Girls School. Ninety seven per cent self-supporting, F.G.S. relies financially on the fees of students. The turbulent struggle going on today in the West Bank has resulted in cut enrolment and severe financial problems for the parents of enrolled students.

Options are frantically being sought to keep F.G.S. (and her sister school F.B.S.) afloat. There are thoughts of merging the two institutions as one possible option. Ahumane are being canvassed for contributions: applications are being submitted to funding organisations. $400,000 need to be raised to keep the schools alive. Your help is needed.

The dream of F.G.S. began over a hundred years ago. The dream to give girls a chance. Eli and Sybil Jones on pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1889 saw the "heavy burdens placed on girls and that they were not given a chance." Education gave them that chance... and what a chance it has given to the girls of Palestine!

Is it the end now? What can we do to make certain that 1989 does not mark the death of Friends Girls School but the birth of another century of service to the women of Palestine?

A pioneer in education for women in Palestine, Friends Girls School commemorates its centennial, (1889-1989). The century of F.G.S.'s existence has been a century of war and political turmoil, of changing governments and occupation, of continuing struggle for independence and self-determination. Yet a century of opportunity and growth for Palestinian women.

Teachers, doctors, lawyers, political analysts, college professors, authors, artists, musicians, counsellors, TV directors, newscasters, nurses, religious leaders, social workers, mothers and wives are numbered in the graduates of Friends Girls School. Women who have been leaders in their society, women who have made a difference where ever they have been... these are the women of Friends Girls School.

Historically linked to the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), F.G.S. has endeavoured to promote tolerance, acceptance, and understanding among the Muslim and Christian girls who have been part of this school family. There has been a "spirit" at F.G.S. throughout this 100 years that evades definition, but which is felt and seen in the lives of its students.

Academically, graduates of F.G.S. have done well in colleges, universities and in the work place. New programmes have been introduced over the years to keep up with the changes in education: computer classes, arts programmes, improved library and science lab, to name a few.

F.G.S. has made a place for the children of returning Palestinians, maintaining an English-speaking section for children who are Palestinian in heritage, yet native English speakers have a place to be educated.

F.G.S. has excelled to maintain the excellent reputation it has held for a hundred years.

NATO faces growing manpower shortages

By Robert J. Wieland
The Associated Press

CASTEAU, Belgium — As NATO marks its 40th birthday, it is engaged in talks with the Soviet-led Warsaw Pact that may do more than yield deep cuts in troops and conventional arms in Europe.

An accord at the Vienna talks, which began March 9, also would help solve a growing manpower problem for military planners at NATO's supreme headquarters allied powers Europe (SHAPE) in this south Belgian town.

Falling birth rates are reducing the pool of men and women, age 18 to 24, to serve in the armies of the 16 allies.

The U.S. Institute for Defence Analysis has forecast that by the year 2000, the NATO nations will post an average 12.4 per cent drop in draft-age males, compared with a 15.2 per cent increase for the seven Warsaw Pact nations. The culprit is a falling birth rate in virtually all NATO nations due to greater use of the birth-control pill in recent decades.

"The problem is not acute in West Germany," said a SHAPE official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "By the year 2000, the supply of draft-age West German males will decline by 45 per cent compared with 1985."

In that same period, he said, the Netherlands will see a 30 per cent drop; Belgium, 27 per cent; Britain and Luxembourg, both 25 per cent; Italy, 23 per cent; Denmark, 17 per cent; France, 13 per cent; and Portugal, 9 per cent.

The Canadian and U.S. armed forces also face a declining manpower base. In 1979, 2.2 million Americans were old enough to sign up for military service. This fell to 1.9 million last year and is forecast to tumble to 1.6 million by 1992. Greece's supply of draft-age males will remain even over the next decade, only Turkey expects a growing pool.

To maintain adequate defences, NATO is considering enhancing the combat role of reserve forces by amending how they are deployed in times of crisis.

"The need to tap this potential has taken on a new urgency," said Gen. John Akehurst, deputy supreme allied commander in Europe.

In wartime, NATO would field 5 million troops. Half of them are reserves — men and women who have done military service or volunteer citizen-soldiers — whose key wartime task is to provide logistical support for combat troops.

The United States already has begun beefing up the role of its reserves, increasing their numbers from 1.4 million to 1.7 million since 1980. West Germany also has begun increasing the number of reservists for military exercises, but with mixed results: in 1985, one-third never showed up.

One problem is that reservists do not enjoy equal prestige in all allied nations. Notable exceptions are the United States, Norway and Denmark.

Military planners also say national rules and regulations for reserve forces vary widely, particularly in length of education and training periods, and how long the military skills are maintained.

"As a result, there is a large pool of reserves... which is not trained to the extent required," the SHAPE official said.

Some NATO nations also are considering how to better use high technology to save on personnel, lengthen the draft (which West Germany did this year) and expand the role of women in the military.

Arafat chef d'Etat

Yasser Arafat est, depuis dimanche, officiellement confirmé dans ses fonctions de chef de l'Etat indépendant de Palestine. Le Conseil central de l'OLP, réuni à Tunis depuis le 1er avril, a centré la décision prise par le Comité exécutif la semaine précédente. Yasser Arafat cumule désormais les fonctions de chef de l'Etat, de président du Comité exécutif de l'OLP et de commandant en chef des forces armées palestiniennes. Il a reçu le soutien de l'ensemble des membres du Conseil central de l'OLP, y compris de l'opposition palestinienne représentée notamment par Nayef-Hawatme, secrétaire général du Front démocratique de libération de la Palestine, et par Georges Habache, secrétaire général du Front populaire de libération de la Palestine. Ce dernier s'est déclaré prêt à participer à un gouvernement provisoire qui s'engagerait à respecter les résolutions du dernier Conseil national palestinien (15 novembre, à Alger), la revendication de la création d'un Etat palestinien et leur droit à l'autodétermination. Yasser Arafat a reçu nombre de messages de félicitations, notamment du roi Hussein de Jordanie, du président tunisien Ben Ali, du roi Fahd et du prince héritier saoudien, du président algérien Chadli, et, en Europe, du chef de l'Etat allemand Erich Honecker. La nomination de Yasser Arafat à la tête de l'Etat palestinien intervient alors que la diplomatie palestinienne est en phase ascendante. Le Canada, l'un des derniers pays occidentaux à bouter l'OLP, vient en effet de lever son veto sur les contacts à haut niveau avec l'organisation palestinienne.

Un responsable de l'ONU à Amman

Le secrétaire général-adjoint des Nations-Unies, M. Marrack Goulding, a effectué lundi une brève visite à Amman, où il a été reçu par le ministre jordanien des Affaires étrangères, M. Marwan al-Kassem. M. Goulding, qui venait de Bagdad, a notamment évoqué lors de cet entretien les efforts de la Jordanie pour instaurer la paix dans la région. Il a également remis à M. al-Kassem «l'appréciation» du secrétaire général de l'ONU pour la contribution de la Jordanie aux forces des Nations-Unies en Angola.

Un écrivain palestinien arrêté en Cisjordanie

L'écrivain palestinien Sami el-Kilani a été arrêté le week-end dernier par les forces de sécurité israéliennes à Naplouse. Les raisons de l'arrestation de M. Kilani, membre de l'association des poètes et écrivains palestiniens, n'ont pas été précisées. De source palestinienne, on précisait lundi que trois autres membres de l'association ont été placés en détention administrative ces derniers mois et n'ont toujours pas été libérés par l'armée israélienne.

Collision ferroviaire meurtrière en Egypte

Cinq personnes ont péri brûlées et plus de cent cinquante autres ont été grièvement blessées dimanche dans la collision de deux trains, près du Caire. L'accident serait dû à une erreur d'aiguillage. Les deux convois, dont l'un transportait du mazout, se sont heurtés de plein front. Selon les autorités égyptiennes, l'autre train transportait près de trois mille passagers.

Inauguration de la mosquée Abdoullah à Amman

Le roi Hussein de Jordanie a inauguré hier la mosquée du roi Abdoullah, dans le quartier d'Abdallah à Amman. Sous son dôme bleu, la nouvelle mosquée pourra recevoir jusqu'à quatre cents croyants. Une librairie, un parking, quelque quarante échoppes ainsi qu'un centre commercial font partie de l'ensemble nouvellement construit. Le coût total des travaux effectués est estimé à près de huit millions et demi de dinars.

Des étudiants français à Amman

La science et la culture

Trente deux étudiants français de Télécom Paris et de l'école des Ponts et Chaussées sont arrivés à Amman samedi dernier pour un séjour d'une semaine en Jordanie. Objectif avoué pour leur professeur d'arabe, qui les accompagne dans leur périple: les plonger dans le bain de la vie locale pour leur faire pratiquer la langue le plus possible.

Ils et elles ont entre 22 et 24 ans. Elèves de deuxième et troisième années des écoles d'ingénieurs de Télécom Paris et des Ponts et Chaussées, on les croit volontiers exclusivement férus de calculs savants et de technologie de pointe. Erreur. Ces futurs ingénieurs ont gardé un coin de matière grise pour découvrir d'autres civilisations. En l'occurrence, celle du monde arabe.

«Leur séjour en Jordanie jusqu'au 9 avril est avant tout destiné à leur faire pratiquer la langue», explique leur accompagnateur et professeur d'arabe, Antoine Karam. «Tous les étudiants qui font ce voyage ont derrière eux une année d'initiation».

Le prof est d'ailleurs plutôt fier de ses élèves. Même si, comme l'avoue l'un d'entre eux, la perspective d'une semaine de dépaysement a pu l'emporter chez certains sur l'effort linguistique. «Ils sont de toute façon obligés de se débrouiller, pour prendre le taxi ou se remplir le ventre...», se réjouit Antoine Karam.

S'ils ont souvent «quartier libre» pour aller flâner où bon leur semble dans les rues d'Amman, les jeunes arabes ont eu également un agenda bien rempli. Avec, à la rubrique scientifique, visites de Telecom Corporation (TCC), de la télévision jordanienne, du Destour et de la Société scientifique royale.

Quant au programme touristique, il les aura conduits à Jérash ou encore à la Mer Morte. «Le tout pour 2.000 francs par étudiant», souligne Antoine Karam, grâce à l'aide financière de plusieurs entreprises françaises comme Alcatel, Sofrecom, ou encore TDF. Preuve que si l'anglais reste la langue hégémonique, les industries ne sont pas si indifférentes que ça des ingénieurs qui investissent dans d'autres langues et d'autres cultures.

Les étudiants de Télécom Paris et des Ponts et Chaussées le sentent bien, au point d'avoir créé, au début de cette année avec leur professeur, une association qu'ils ont baptisée «Arabesants grandes écoles». Leur objectif: développer les échanges culturels et scientifiques avec leurs homologues du monde arabe.

Le pont du wadi Saqra en travaux

Gommer les dos d'âne

Tous ceux qui ont emprunté le pont du wadi Saqra, entre le quatrième cercle et Shmeisani (Queen Noor street) en ont fait l'expérience: les grands se cognent la tête contre le toit de la voiture, les moins grands font un bond sur leur siège. Curieux dos d'âne obligent. L'affaissement de la route ne date pas d'hier. Depuis, la construction du pont en 1978, des travaux ont été entrepris à plusieurs reprises. On colmatait tant bien que mal, à coup de pistons d'asphalte. L'étrange dépression qui se faisait jour au beau milieu de l'édifice. Cette fois, la municipalité d'Amman a ordonné la réfection totale de la chaussée. Les pelleteuses des travaux publics ont commencé à creuser une partie de la route, il y a quelques jours. «Nous refaisons entièrement le revêtement, en mettant de la terre et des gravats sur une épaisseur de 30 centimètres», explique M. Kamal Jalouqa, responsable de l'urbanisme à la mairie. L'idée étant de rendre le sol plus compact. «Il n'y a aucun signe d'affaissement de terrain», précise-t-il, à l'adresse de ceux qui regardent avec anxiété les quelque 30mètres de dénivellation entre le pont et le wadi Saqra. «La première tranche de travaux devrait être achevée dans deux semaines, et la route sera de nouveau entièrement praticable au début du mois de mai», promet M. Jalouqa. (A.R.)

Les clubs de culturisme se multiplient à Amman

Des haltères pour développer l'ego

Mens sane in corpore sano. Si la puissance du cerveau se mesurait au galbe du muscle, la piscine de Sports city ferait figure de Panthéon de la matière grise. Un creuset de culturistes. On n'y compte plus les hercules moustachus venus exhiber des biceps hirsutes sculptés dans le roc, des pectoraux gonflés comme des chambres à air et de très durs abdominaux en tablettes de chocolat.

Le phénomène Rambo ferait-il de émules? En tout cas, il fait des émules. «J'aime le genre muscle, avec des épaules carrées et un ventre plat, bien bâti», avoue Randa, 25 ans. On bâtit donc, et en béton s'il vous plaît. Haro sur les attendrissants abdomens repelés et les poignées d'amour, corollaires du hommos et de l'huile d'olive. Selon Mahmoud Jarasheh, vice-président de la fédération jordanienne de body building, 20 nouveaux clubs ont ouvert ces deux dernières années à Amman, où l'on compte en tout une cinquantaine d'établissements pour le développement du muscle.

Tel le club Noor, inauguré à djebel Hussein, il y a trois mois. Soixante candidats à la turgescence viennent s'y entraîner quotidiennement. Pousser, tirer, bisser, soutenir, allonger, repos. A la différence de la gymnastique de papa, le body-building requiert toute une gamme d'appareils en acier bardés de sangles, de poignées, de ressorts et de compteurs, pour travailler chaque muscle individuellement. On s'attend presque à y trouver une chaise électrique, une roue à écarter ou une guillotine.

Mais point, ici, la torture est librement consentie, selon le principe ancestral: «Il faut souffrir pour être beau». Et souffrir souvent. Mahmoud Jarasheh, 41 ans, qui collectionne les titres, annonce la couleur: «Pendant les trois mois précédant une compétition, je prends un congé pour pouvoir m'entraîner six heures par jour. En temps normal, quatre heures quotidiennes sont nécessaires pour garder la forme». Ce n'est qu'à ce prix qu'il a pu se hisser sur les podiums du culturisme international (3ème M. Univers en 1977 à Londres, 4ème en 1984 en RFA, 4ème en 1987 aux Etats-Unis).

En vrai «professionnel», M. Jarasheh fustige le mercantilisme de la plupart des clubs récemment ouverts à Amman. «Ils ne pensent qu'à faire marcher le tiroir-caisse, sans attention pour la compétition. Il y a peine une centaine de culturistes qui s'entraînent sérieusement dans le pays», déplore-t-il, rappelant que les années soixante furent l'âge d'or du body-building. Mais, à défaut de plus de sérieux, M. Jarasheh se félicite tout de même de la popularisation d'un sport jadis confiné à des cercles très «camionneurs-durs-tatoués».

Avocats, médecins...

«Autrefois, on associait le culturisme aux mauvais garçons. Aujourd'hui, mes clients sont des avocats, des médecins...», reconnaît Tarek Khorma, 25 ans, directeur du club «Power Hot», ouvert il y a trois mois à Shmeisani. L'exemple pour la sculpture musculaire? Tarek raconte qu'il a commencé aux Etats-Unis, où il était étudiant. «On commence par en faire pour perdre du ventre, pour séduire physiquement. Et puis cela devient comme une drogue, tellement on se sent bien», explique-t-il.

Les premiers frissons ont été ressentis dans la région dès les années 1950, apportés par le cinéma et les magazines américains. Tarzan fut un modèle pour les culturistes de l'époque. «Ce sont ces images venues du Nouveau Continent qui m'ont incité à commencer le culturisme», se souvient Abdel Mouham Abu-Touq, fondateur en 1964 du club «Dar El Karan», le premier spécialisé dans le body-building. M. Abu Touq confesse, de plus, avoir été convaincu dans sa jeunesse par la formule «gros muscles, grand

MM. Moubarak et Shamir aux Etats-Unis

La porte étroite de Washington

Le président égyptien a quitté Washington pour le Caire, hier, à l'issue d'une visite officielle de quatre jours aux Etats-Unis. Hosni Moubarak s'est entretenu pendant une heure lundi avec George Bush. Les deux hommes ont réaffirmé leur commun engagement en faveur du processus de paix au Proche-Orient. Sans parvenir toutefois à tomber d'accord sur la convocation d'une conférence internationale, pour amener Palestiniens et Israéliens à ouvrir des négociations directes. M. Moubarak a par ailleurs refusé de rencontrer M. Shamir, arrivé mardi soir dans la capitale américaine.

Le chassé-croisé entre Hosni Moubarak et Yitzhak Shamir, mercredi à Washington, illustre bien la difficile partie diplomatique engagée cette semaine par les Etats-Unis. Allié inconditionnel de Tel Aviv, la Maison Blanche a également conscience qu'il lui faut être attentive aux positions de son partenaire égyptien. D'autant plus que le Caire effectue depuis quelques mois une remontée spectaculaire sur le devant de la scène du Proche-Orient.

M. Moubarak, qui vient de recevoir coup sur coup le roi Hussein de Jordanie et Yasser Arafat, puis le roi Fahd d'Arabie saoudite, se savait attendu avec beaucoup d'intérêt par les responsables américains. Décidé à faire «bonger les choses», le président égyptien peut se féliciter d'avoir été entendu par son homologue américain. A l'issue d'un entretien d'une heure entre les deux hommes, George Bush a ainsi déclaré qu'il partageait avec son hôte «un sentiment d'urgence» à parvenir à un règlement global au Proche-Orient.

Le président des Etats-Unis a estimé nécessaire de créer une nouvelle atmosphère dans la région pour qu'Arabes et Israéliens prennent conscience que les deux parties étaient désormais prêtes à des compromis.

Mais alors que M. Moubarak parlait d'une solution au problème palestinien par des négociations directes dans le cadre d'une «conférence internationale de paix» sous l'égide de l'ONU, M. Bush a surtout insisté sur l'ouverture au plus vite de négociations directes. Une conférence internationale pourrait selon lui se révéler «utile», si elle était «convenablement structurée», à un «moment approprié». En clair, les Etats-Unis estiment que beaucoup reste à faire avant un tel événement.

Les deux hommes ont cependant souligné que leurs buts étaient communs: «sécurité d'Israël, fin de l'occupation (de la Cisjordanie et de Gaza) et réalisation des droits politiques des Palestiniens», comme l'a rappelé George Bush, sans néanmoins jamais mentionner l'OLP. M. Moubarak pour sa part qual-ifie d'irréalisable l'idée d'élections dans les territoires occupés, avancée par M. Shamir.

Les questions économiques, qui ont entraîné l'an dernier la suspension d'une partie de l'aide américaine au Caire, ont également été au cœur du voyage de M. Moubarak à Washington. Le président égyptien s'en est entretenu mardi avec le secrétaire d'Etat américain, James Baker, et le secrétaire au Trésor, Nicholas Brady. Il a présenté aux deux responsables américains les mesures déjà prises pour réformer l'économie de son pays, tout en insistant sur leur rythme gradué, destiné à éviter d'éventuels troubles sociaux et politiques.

Yitzhak Shamir, qui doit rentrer aujourd'hui même George Bush, a indiqué juste avant son départ d'Israël son intention de «présenter des idées nouvelles» au président américain, tout en rappelant son opposition de principe à la conférence internationale proposée par M. Moubarak. Le premier ministre israélien, qui doit passer dix jours aux Etats-Unis, sait que ce voyage est sans doute l'un des plus difficiles de sa carrière politique.

D'autant plus difficile qu'il lui faudra obtenir un minimum de résultats avant la venue à Washington, le 19 avril, du roi Hussein de Jordanie, qui lui insistera, de nouveau sur les propositions des pays arabes modérés. (d'après agences).

20 morts dans les inondations

Le Sud-Yémen éprouvé

La liste des victimes des inondations dans le centre du Sud-Yémen s'allonge après trois semaines consécutives de pluies torrentielles. Un bilan provisoire recense, lundi, plus de vingt morts et plusieurs dizaines de blessés. Les dégâts matériels paralysent la région.

Ils sont plus de 100.000 à avoir quitté leurs maisons, détruites par les torrents de pluie. Sans abri, ils sont aussi sans travail: les inondations ont ravagé plusieurs centaines de champs agricoles et décimé les troupeaux de bétail dans les gouvernorats de Hadramout, Al-Mahrah et Shabwa, dans le centre du Sud-Yémen.

Dans la seule ville de Saywun, cité historique au cœur de la vallée de Hadramout, 172 maisons se sont effondrées, 122 autres menacées de s'écrouler et 48 bâtiments publics, dont des écoles et des dispensaires, ont été plus ou moins endommagés. Le réseau d'eau potable et les câbles électriques ont été rompus par la violence des torrents. La ville entière pourrait être rayée de la carte si le barrage qui la protège, et qui est déjà partiellement détruit, venait à céder.

Après la destruction de l'habitat, les pluies attaquent le relief. Les fissures et les crevasses se multiplient dans les zones montagneuses. Face aux menaces d'éboulements, les autorités font évacuer les villes à flanc de montagne, notamment dans la vallée de Hadramout, au bord de l'océan Indien.

Les sinistrés, qui augmentent de jour en jour, restent difficiles à dénicher et à localiser. Les secours d'urgence et sont d'autant plus compliqués. Dans la région d'Al-Hawar, près de 20.000 habitants sont encerclés par les eaux et ne peuvent être ravitaillés en vivres et médicaments que par hélicoptère.

Plusieurs pays se sont mobilisés pour assister les sinistrés, notamment l'Arabie saoudite, le Koweït, les Emirats Arabes Unis, le Yémen du nord, le sultanat d'Oman, la Grande-Bretagne, la France, ainsi que la FAO (Food Aid Organisation). (d'après agences).

Elections en Tunisie

Victoire totale de Ben Ali

Le président tunisien, Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali, a été élu dimanche chef de l'Etat en obtenant plus de 99% des suffrages exprimés. Candidat unique à cette élection anticipée, M. Ben Ali, 53 ans, bénéficiait du soutien de la majorité et de l'opposition. Le scrutin, en forme de plébiscite, visait à conforter sa fonction présidentielle, à laquelle il avait accédé le 7 novembre 1987 après la destitution de M. Habib Bourguiba, pour «incapacité physique».

Selon le ministère tunisien de l'Intérieur, le taux de participation a atteint un peu plus de 76% pour cette élection. Il s'est élevé à près de 76,5% pour les Législatives anticipées qui se déroulaient le même jour dans le pays. La différence, indiquant-on lundi soir à Tunis, s'explique par un nombre plus élevé d'inscrits, les émigrés tunisiens pouvant voter.

Plus incertain, ce deuxième scrutin s'est également soldé par une victoire totale du parti au pouvoir, le Rassemblement constitutionnel démocratique.

Le RCD a en effet élevé les 141 sièges de députés, en totalisant 80,48% des suffrages. Les cinq formations de l'opposition, qui étaient en lice, ont obtenu entre 0,21% (Parti socialiste du progrès-centre droite) et 3,76% (Mouvement des démocrates socialistes-centre). Dix neuf des vingt deux listes «indépendantes» constituées pour ces Législatives, étaient fortement soutenues par les islamistes.

Pour sa première participation à un tel scrutin en Tunisie, le courant fondamentaliste a enregistré de bons scores. A Tunis et à Sousse, notamment, les candidats à la députation qu'il soutenait ont totalisé entre 25 et 30% des voix. Selon certains observateurs, les listes proches du mouvement islamiste auraient obtenu un peu plus de 12% des suffrages exprimés. (d'après agences).

SORTIR

Jazz en France

Da swing des années 1920 au free jazz de Michel Portal en passant par les accents gitans de la guitare de Django Reinhardt: le jazz français a son histoire, sa tradition. Une tradition qui s'enracine dans les airs de Ray Ventura et ses Collegiens, dans les années 1930 et explose dans les caves de Saint Germain des Prés, vingt ans plus tard. Boris Vian et sa trompette aiment alors les existentialistes à l'affût de sons nouveaux. Les musiciens américains adoptent la scène parisienne pour ne plus la quitter. Le Paris du jazz est né.

Aujourd'hui encore, Memphis Slim, pour ne citer que lui, est vu plus souvent au «caveau» de la Huchette que dans les clubs New Yorkais. Côté français, Claude Nougaro, Michel Portal ou encore l'Orchestre National de jazz ont pris le relais avec succès. L'exposition présente les meilleurs moments de l'histoire du jazz en France. Elle donne à voir mais aussi à entendre grâce à six heures de vidéo, proposées à la carte ou en continue (Orchestre National de jazz, Michel Portal, René Entregre, Claude Nougaro, François Jeannet, le Printemps de Bourges). CCF, à partir du 5 et jusqu'au 13 avril.

An American stops in Amman while on a Trans-Med Bike Tour

A wandering dervish in a track suit

By John West

Spec. to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — Driving down the King's Highway over the next few days, you may pass a small figure crouched over a bicycle, wobbling up the slopes of Wadi Mujib and coasting down them, with 40 kilograms of baggage looming behind him like the plumage of some strange bird beading south to the waters of the Red Sea. If you do, stop and talk to him. For Robert Guzman, a 37-year-old Mexican-American migrant, sportsman, writer and seeker after truth, is an interesting man.

He has been cycling for three years, inching his way round the Mediterranean on his battered old, heavy-framed bicycle, on what he calls the Trans-Med Bike Tour, sponsored by British Airways. Starting in Britain and moving down to Spain in 1986, he rounded the Iberian peninsula and then spent six months in Barcelona regathering strength and resources. In 1987, he crossed France, Italy, Yugoslavia and Greece before wintering in Athens. Next year followed the Greek islands, Thracian and looping Turkish coastline before crossing over the Syrian border and into the Arab World. On 1989's agenda is a leisurely trip down to Aqaba, the boat to Nweibeh, round the coast of Sinai and another six month pit stop in Cairo. Final destination is Casablanca, but when asked to hazard a date he replies, "Allahu 'alam" (God knows best) — like many seasoned travellers, he feels that computation is next to presumption.

"The trip has its own life, and I'm really no more than its agent," he says, as if talking about a figure of authority. For Guzman, his trip is a mission, a teacher and a friend. Despite lack of fund, a frail physique and the wear and tear of three years on the road, he is sure of pursuing his journey to the end — "I'd be too afraid not to finish it now." All the obstacles put in his way have only served to make him more certain of what he is doing. "I'm not a very good cyclist" — at a skinny 5 foot 8, and looking his 37 years, Guzman is nobody's idea of a strapping athlete — "and when I started I used to get sick a lot. The bike is 15 years old," he added. But despite the rugged mountains and rough coastal roads that skirt the whole of the Mediterranean, he averages one puncture every 1000 miles.

Unattached

Of course, an Odyssey such as his can be emotionally as well as physically exhausting. The strain of having no ties and not being close to anyone for three years takes its toll, he admits. But Guzman is resigned to his fate

"the trip holds me to one condition — that I have nothing to lose. Every time I seem to be getting involved — and maybe that about travelling with someone — something happens. I lose my traveller's cheques or something." He describes how he broke his arm in Greece. "I was a hundred yards away from the boat to Athens and thinking 'I must find a place, I must find a job, will my friends be there?' instead of thinking about what had just happened," the end of his second year on the bike — "and appreciating it. The trip was angry with me." And so he slipped and fell and broke his arm in a very mundane accident.

"My triumphant entry into Athens was in the back of a taxi with a crazy driver. I was frightened and hurting." But fate took another twist, this time the good "he took me down to the casualty ward of a hospital and waited for me until my arm was set. Both he and the doctors refused to accept any money."

Guzman has found his trip easier this year than in the two previous ones, largely because of the attitudes of the people. I think my worst time was in Italy — it was the end of a fall, and very cold although you get used to that. But I was sleeping out all the time because the hotels were too expensive, and I guess I showed it after a time. Virtually my only contact with civilisation was brushing my teeth in the morning and people began to treat me like a bum — "What do you want?" "How much did you take?" "Did you pay for that?" "are you sure?"

"But the deeper into the Muslim world you go, the easier everything gets, the more people accept you." Guzman feels under special protection here — "Italy gives you the bare minimum — in Syria and Jordan you are a honoured guest." Three weeks ago he was near Nabek in Syria in the early evening. The rain was so strong that he had been stopped three times during the day, the road was thick with mud, and then his bike got a puncture, leaving him stuck. "God help me" I thought, and five minutes later a guy came up on his motorbike and "asked me if I'd like to stay at his house for the night."

Guzman is no stranger to the Middle East, having taught English for five years in Saudi Arabia. Which is the trade he supports himself with during his resting stages. During his time there, he went out of his way to make friends with Arabs and began to feel an affinity with the culture which he feels is based on his own Mexican, and therefore Hispanic, heritage — "we feel the dark, the big issues of life and death, which go beyond the bedonism and materialism of other Mediterranean countries."

"I always remember seeing on the wall of a toilet in Greece what an Italian had written 'I love only nature and beautiful women.' Underneath, in a clear hand, a Spaniard had replied 'only an Italian can write similar stupidities.' That said it for me."

Souls of nations, lie untouched

Guzman is necessarily a philosopher. "Knowledge of the ways of men, the good in them and the bad" is forced upon him as it was upon Odysseus. His slow progress on the bike, panting and sweating his way up and down the contours of a landscape, sleeping and eating where he can and mixing with whoever will mix with him, gives him both the particular and the universal. If he compares Spain with Syria, it is not via books, concepts or sparkling conversation but by the personal experience of having ridden through dozens of towns, villages and come across hundreds of people in both countries. He feels that his ground level view makes him a participant in what he observes — "when you're on a bike, and you pass through a village, for a few minutes you're one of them." His minute experience has convinced him that the peoples of the Mediterranean are still tremendously different from each other, and dismisses the idea that mass media and world monoculture have destroyed each region's peculiar character. "These things are only the froth on the surface — the deep, the soul of nations, lies untouched."

The book he is writing is a comparison of Mediterranean cultures, delving into there past in an attempt to throw light on what is going on now, and he supplements his travels with general reading on the countries he passes through. He is currently reading Philip Hitti's "History of the Arabs," which he travelled specially to Aleppo to buy, and was full of the idea of Protestantism forming Europe. His earlier experience with V.S. Naipaul's "Among the Believers," however, was not so fruitful.

No sympathy, no understanding

"I found it very informative, but I had to reject what he said. How can you write about a people devoid of any sympathy for them? I felt he had no understanding."

Guzman is interested in almost anything, and unlike his sedentary counterparts, seems to have no hierarchy or categorisation of topics when he talks. His conversation ranged in two hours over the differences between dramatic Italian and analytical French journalism — "they try so hard to be perfect it's boring," the ancestry of the Brazilian Indians, the remains of Germanic Idealism as brought by the Visigoths to Toledo, Yugoslavian mountain passes, the student revolts of the 1960's, the Irishness of North West Spain, the Devil, trust, James Dean and Macedonians in Detroit.

But, paradoxically, the most amazing thing about Guzman is that he is totally ordinary. He speaks softly and in an odd hotch-potch of accents, stopping sometimes to search for the right word. He is slow in his body movements. As he talks, there seems nothing incongruous about his description of 'the trip' as an external agent acting upon him. When the trip is over, he plans to return to his home in the smoky mountains of Tennessee and go back to college to get a masters degree, maybe in business administration. Despite not having spoken to his family since last October, he describes them as close. In fact, far from being a dashing swashbuckler, Guzman gives the overwhelming impression of being an ordinary man caught up in, and yielding to, something greater than himself. It leads him a presence and a calm that many a great man might envy.

Years of perpetual flux have given him a seemingly unshakable stability. He resembles the legendary Umar al-Bukhari, the controversial sage who, when once asked how he felt replied "I feel like one who has walked in the morning and does not know whether he will be alive when the sun goes down." "But that is the condition of all men," his detractors sneered. "Yes," came Umar's reply, "but how many of them FEEL it." Guzman for his part feels that the reception he has in the Arab World goes beyond even codes of hospitality, and is linked to this other tradition, the seekers after truth.

"I was introduced in Syria to the concept of 'talab al'im', and realised at once that that's how the Arabs see me." (The 'seekers of knowledge' have for thousands of years been a prominent part of spiritual life in the Middle East, involving penniless travel by the seeker begging alms or working along the way for years and years, and often related to scholarly work of one kind or another. The seeker hoped to gain spiritual fulfilment by the experience gained on his travels). "That's the reason why in Europe I was often treated with suspicion whereas here perfectly ordinary people, some of whom have never been further than the nearest large town themselves, understand what I am doing." In another age, Robert Guzman might have been called a wandering dervish.

So if you see a figure dawdling along the road down to Aqaba on his bike, or sitting under a tree in his track suit, taking tea with some villagers, stop and talk to him. There's more to him than meets the eye.

Seeds of hope for Lima's street children

By Martin Foreman

'Germinal' works with youngsters who live on the streets of Lima, Peru. Germinal is among a new generation of organisations worldwide which recognise that AIDS prevention is a complex issue and it therefore starts by dealing with the young people's emotional and economic needs.

LIMA, Peru — "We met one boy from the provinces who couldn't read or write. He only knew how to get on a bus to come to San Martin Square and how to get a bus back out to the suburbs where his family was now living. He was afraid to go anywhere else in case he got lost and couldn't find his way home again. We never saw him again."

Tito Bracamonte was speaking about one of the many youths he and his colleagues met in the heart of Lima, Peru. Perhaps the boy had simply come to look around. But it was more likely that he had heard that this was a place where money could be made from men looking for sex.

In either case the fact that he was illiterate and a newcomer to this sprawling city of six million people made it easy for others to take advantage of him — exactly the kind of person who Tito Bracamonte hopes to meet.

Bracamonte, a history student in his early 20s, works for Germinal, an organisation which tries to help young people between 13 and 20 who, for one reason or another, find themselves wandering the streets of this South American capital.

It was ten o'clock on a warm tropical evening and San Martin and the surrounding streets and shopping galleries were crowded with people, mostly men, out for a stroll, talking to friends, waiting for a bus, or just waiting for something to happen. It didn't need a practised eye to spot the teenagers loitering alone by benches or shop-windows.

Although few of the adolescents whom Tito meets are actually homeless, family tensions will often force them to run away from their parents for a day or two. The emotional problems are often made worse by economic difficulties.

Many of the boys turn to prostitution, which at first glance seems to be a short-term solution but is more likely to cause long-term problems, particularly with the risk of sexually-transmitted diseases, including AIDS.

Ridd Barnen

It was in order to help these boys — and girls in a similar situation, although they are much more difficult to reach — that Germinal was set up, founded by Ridd Barnen (Save the Children) of Sweden.

Although AIDS education is a key aspect of the programme, it is not the primary aim; rather, Germinal tries to build up the boys' self-confidence and self-respect, so that they are able to make their own decisions about whether to continue on the streets.

The first stage is to spend time talking to them in the streets, to tell them there is a place — Germinal's offices — where they can get information about AIDS and other means of earning a living.

Not all the boys offer sex for money and, according to Germinal's director, Francisco Basili, it is important not to classify those who do as prostitutes.

His argument is that they do not see what they do as a regular job and their primary source of income, but merely as a means of getting through a difficult period until they can find a job or continue their education. "Often what interests them most in sex with a stranger is the offer of affection as much as money, even if they are not themselves homosexual. They need the emotional support which they are not getting at home."

Self protection

But as with prostitutes, the boys are at great risk from HIV, the virus which causes AIDS. So Germinal has produced a leaflet on how to protect yourself.

It is also working on a small address book which will have AIDS education messages on the pages between the addresses. "The boys like the idea," says Basili. "It makes them feel important. They're constantly consulting the books and that way they're gradually getting used to the message."

Germinal is one of a new generation of educators worldwide who recognise that AIDS prevention is a much more complex issue than at first appears. Experience in a number of countries has shown that you can give people the facts about AIDS transmission but they won't necessarily act upon them.

In order to ensure that the message gets through, educators have to deal with the individual's most pressing concerns: in Germinal's line of work, emotional and economic problems come up most.

Others are dealing with the problem in the same way — from the community leaders who take sex education to the schools of Calao, Peru's largest port, to the "street educators" working with even younger and homeless children in cities across the world.

Severe economic problems, typified by an inflation rate of over 2,000% and widespread underemployment, together with the growing terrorist attacks of the militant guerrillas of Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path), are driving more and more refugees to the shantytowns building up around Lima.

With whole families uprooted and little prospect of regular income for parents or children, the number of emotionally disturbed and economically disadvantaged adolescents is certain to grow — Panos.

Brazil's Cardinal is proud to be called subversive

By Stephen Powell

Reuter

SAO PAULO — In a country with some of the world's worst social inequalities, Cardinal Paulo Evaristo Arns, Brazil's most eminent exponent of the theology of liberation, says he is proud to be called subversive.

Liberation theology is a doctrine which gives priority to working with the poor and oppressed but which stirs deep anxieties among conservatives.

The Vatican of Pope John Paul II has never warmed to liberation theology and the 67-year-old archbishop, known here as Dom Paulo, has just been shown off half of his flock, by a Vatican decree announced March 15.

His archdiocese of Sao Paulo, formerly one of the biggest in the world, was effectively halved by the creation of four new satellite dioceses each with their own bishop — a move seen by many commentators as another conservative advance by the Vatican.

In Brazil, a nation presided over by a political elite, conservatives regularly denounce the Roman Catholic Church as a Communist organisation.

A leading spokesman of the right, presidential candidate Ronald Caiado, savaged the church in a recent newspaper interview.

He said it "uses tactics of fomenting guerrilla war, (land) invasions, class struggle and places Jesus Christ at the disposal of Karl Marx, saying that the promised land is Cuba and the messiah is Fidel Castro."

Earlier this year conservative newspapers mounted a press campaign against the cardinal because he corresponded with the Cuban leader. Arns responded that he maintained contacts with several heads of state.

Campaigns for human rights

Known for his fearless campaigning for human rights during the 1964-85 military dictatorship, Arns has long had to live with taunts that he is a subversive or a Communist.

"To call us subversive is a badge of honour," he said at an Easter news conference, "because it enables the people to know that subversives — and Jesus was one — help the poorest, the weakest and want above all for everyone to be well, not just a few."

Arns has not entered into the controversy over the division of his archdiocese, which has taken out of his control about 1,000 of the city's squalid shantytowns but still leaves him with one of the world's largest.

"The division has already been amply explained as being a natural phenomenon," he said at his news conference. "Every time that there is a very large number of Christians, the work also increases and it is normal for there to be a division."

But his spokesman, Father Sergio Calixto Valverde, told interviewers that there was some truth in the interpretation that the division was intended to clip the wings of Brazil's progressive church.

The closest Arns comes to criticising the Vatican is to say that many people felt there should have been more consultation.

"There was no consultation. The people were not consulted, the priests were not consulted," said Father Manoel Godoy, one of about 300 laymen and priests who took part in a protest fast on March 22.

Before the split Arns had an area encompassing 395 parishes with a population of 14.5 million. Today he has 241 parishes with about 7.6 million people.

To work with the people

Arns, whose warm eyes twinkle benignly behind his spectacles, denied suggestions that the bishops appointed to the four new dioceses were conservative and added: "All have promised to work with the people."

Church liberals said that in Brazil as a whole the Vatican had been working steadily to increase the influence of conservatives. They said not one progressive bishop had been appointed in the country in the past eight years. Some of Brazil's progressive clergy have had their differences with Pope John Paul II.

Last September Spanish-born bishop Pedro Casaldaliga, a leading champion of landless peasants in central Brazil, received a letter from Rome telling him to remain strictly faithful to the church's teachings.

The most celebrated case was in 1985, when the Pope condemned one of Arns's former pupils, Father Leonardo Boff, to a year's silence because of his radical views on liberation theology.

PARIS — After years of bitter controversy, a gleaming and renovated Louvre museum, crowned by a tall glass pyramid at its entrance, is about to open to the public.

For months, the French have been waiting for a look at the high-tech, ultra-modern facilities designed to turn a once-exhausting tour of the Louvre's dark and dingy galleries into sheer joy.

The six-year, $850-million overhaul will turn the Louvre into the world's largest museum once the last of its new galleries — occupied by the finance ministry for the past 100 years — opens in 1993.

The pyramid entrance was being inaugurated by President Francois Mitterrand, and was opened to the public on March 30.

Visitors who once wandered in search of the museum's main entrance won't have any trouble finding the new one. It soars dramatically between the Louvre's two main wings and is set off by three smaller pyramids and fountains illuminated at night.

A graceful spiral staircase takes visitors down to a spacious underground lobby where they will find ticket windows, bookshops, restaurants, boutiques and a 400-seat auditorium.

From below, the view is breathtaking — the ornate architecture of the Louvre's twin towers, looms against the ever-changing grays of the Paris skyline.

Visitors also will find video screens indicating in several languages which galleries are closed as well as the best routes for finding key works like the "Mona Lisa" and "winged victory."

With some 60,000 square metres of additional space, dozens of important works have been dusted off and put on display for the first time in decades.

Afficionados of 16th and 17th century French painters will appreciate the newly restored galleries, 14 altogether when finished in 1993, on the third floor of the Cour Carre overlooking the pyramid.

Works to be shown there include "l'Histoire d'Alexandre," a huge, four-panel wall mural by Charles Lebrun (1619-1690) not seen in public since 1963, and "Le repas chez Simon" by Pierre Subleyras (1699-1749), never displayed before at the Louvre.

The Louvre guards will be dressed in chic new navy-blue outfits designed by Yves Saint Laurent.

The Louvre project, Mitterrand's brainchild, was plunged into controversy from the start. Problems arose when he hand-picked American architect I.M. Pei to design the project, bypassing the traditional architectural competition.

Pei's design — a 21-metre pyramid of special thick, slightly tinted glass soaring between the Louvre's main wings — was cause for further outrage. Critics lambasted the clash of new and old, and warned that the pyramid would turn the Louvre into a subway entrance or "Disneyland annex."

But Pei and Mitterrand held firm, and the tide turned in their favour when a full-size cable model was erected in 1985.

Turning a centuries-old palace into a space-age museum was no easy task. History had to be respected.

Before the pyramid went up, teams of archaeologists worked day and night excavating centuries of ruins under the Napoleon courtyard. They unearthed thousands of artifacts that unlocked some of the mysteries of everyday life in Paris from the 13th to the 19th centuries.

Animal bones, porcelain dinnerware, cooking utensils, vases, pitchers and a cache of 200 silver coins dating from the French revolution turned up in what historians believed to be common latrines.

All these and much more are also on display as the Louvre tells the dramatic story of its own history.

The Louvre was built in 1200 by King Philippe Auguste as a walled fortress to protect Paris from English invaders. In the 1600s, the Austere castle became more livable but did not become a royal residence until Louis XIII made it bigger to accommodate his ever-expanding court.

A century later, as Louis XIV deserted the Louvre for more sumptuous quarters at Versailles, the Louvre declined and was gradually taken over by artists' colonies. The idea of a museum was envisaged by King Louis XVI before his death at the guillotine, but it did not become a reality until 1793.

Archaeologists laid bare the medieval, rounded turrets of Philippe Auguste's fortress and the base of the castle keep. They also unearthed a decorative stone wall built for Louis XIV. Visitors will be able to walk among the ruins, which are illuminated with soft, golden light.

Pei's design — a 21-metre pyramid of special thick, slightly tinted glass soaring between the Louvre's main wings — was cause for further outrage.

Salma Hamad Al Thani:

Temperamental landscapes

By Nelly Lama
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — An exhibition of paintings by Salma Hamad Al Thani was inaugurated by Her Royal Highness Princess Basma on the 2nd of April at the Royal Cultural Centre.

Salma Hamad Al Thani does not claim to be a professional artist, she puts it simply: "To me painting is a hobby I acquired two years ago, but since then it has become a passion and I work at it all the time. I have given up much of my social life to deal solely with art." She is particularly grateful to her Qatari husband, her children and her friends, for being supportive of her new found passion.

Her commitment to art did not go unrewarded, for she has, in so little time, acquired a good sense of design and a spontaneity that gives her works a lighthearted sense of freshness.

It is imperative to mention here that Salma travels constantly; she visits museums and acquires good art books. All this polishes her sense of observation and sensitivity which she lavishes on her canvases, leaving the observer in a state of surprise at how a self taught artist of two years can work on agile compositions that lack neither form nor balance.

Salma paints straight from nature, for which she bears great sentiment. She takes her palette knife and approaches the canvas with assurance transforming the empty space into tumultuous waves and skies. The trunks of trees have a no less movemented form, textures form a raised impasto. This is found in her painting "Stream" where features of the landscapes are apparent by sway in an uproar of impasto in the manner of Rouault. Green is highlighted with yellow, the brown ground with orange. Her intense colours enhance the mobility and vivacity of the work.

Other landscapes tend to be less tumultuous "Summer Windows" is a more atmospheric painting, its horizontality contributes to its calm.

"Blue Sword" is a mature composition of a violet bridge over a blue sea (reminiscent of the mystery of symbolist colour schemes), with an interesting division of space bent towards abstraction, a horizon line in the depth gives depth and perspective.

"Autumn" has a multitude of shades of green painted flat against a movement sky. Green and purple plants sway right and left in the foreground picking up that movement. There is a big contrast between the yellow (of the sand) and the gray patch beside it, this she saves with a black outline, thus giving each colour more ascent.

No arrangements

Salma's choice of colour is not studied. She makes no prior arrangement for a colour scheme, instead, she chooses her colours as she proceeds with the painting, always adding or changing according to what she feels the painting needs.

"Neckgrass" is a landscape seen from a window done in the style of Matisse with a variety of patches of colour, pattern design and a little outlining.

"The Arch" is a large canvas with a movemented tree trunk that forms a superb diagonal thrust within an open space, a seemingly abstract design. It is balanced by the small brushstrokes that fill the lower edge of the canvas.

"Boats and Clouds" is divided into a ratio of 1/3 - 2/3, an ideal division of space (Renaissance). The upper part is covered with a decorative pattern design of high-contrast branches. A gray area is superimposed on the dividing section, while the lower part has Salma's favoured movemented trunk going into a frenzy held in check by the pointillist rendering of the foreground.

"Spring" curiously does not have much green in it. The background is pink. A tree in bloom is rendered in pointillist style with dots of white interspersed by squiggly lines that enhance the fresh rhythms that give spring its prancing lightness. The only detriment to this painting is the heavy green branches that she introduces on the sides.

Salma is much affected by the Qatari landscape that she finds fascinating, especially the antique areas that are being restored. Here she stylises the forms taking only the essential areas, adding haphazardly onto the surface big brushstrokes of a lighter colour.

Her still lifes offer well-studied forms which, in spite of being stylised, keep a good observance of volumes. Big frank patches of light highlight the objects and sometimes are more of a point of emphasis than the object itself.

"Blue hand" is a detail of a leaf with veins. The way she shades the blue ground with brown at intervals shows her strong sense of observation. It is a close-up that bends towards abstraction retaining Salma's love of pattern.

Salma exhibits some abstract paintings that she calls "Reactions." They are done hurriedly with a palette knife, their nervous composition exhibits strong thrusts of mixed colour with little depth.

"Reactions 3" bears witness to a mature artist and not an amateur. It is a vertical canvas covered with texture, and a good interaction of intense colours performing a meaningful interplay over the given space.

An artist of great temperament, with a good sense of pattern and design, Salma Hamad Al Thani holds great potential. Her landscapes as well as her still lifes carry a mark of their own, stylisation is her strength. As for her abstract knifework, she could be advised to go slower and more rationally about it.

Galicia — a forgotten world

By Francisco Conde
The Associated Press

SURRIBAS, Spain — Paulino Fernandez was a reserved, distant man obsessed with his land in this isolated mountain hamlet. Then, one day, the 64-year-old farmer stabbed six neighbours to death before burning himself to death in his farmhouse.

News of the March 7 massacre reverberated nationwide, focusing brief but intense attention on Galicia, a long-ignored, underdeveloped region in Northwestern Spain where only 27 per cent of the population lives in cities.

"It appears clearly to have been an attack of madness," said historian Ramon Villares Paz. "Yet it's a paradigmatic incident, a sort of death cry of a rural society of elderly people with a tightly held conviction that their culture has no future."

"Surribas is isolated, like a majority of villages in Galicia, populated mainly by old people, with problems of communication between them, without any future, without horizons," he said.

Fernandez's violent attack on his unsuspecting neighbours was, Villares Paz said, "more than homicide, an incident that suggests a kind of attempt at collective self-punishment — 'we have no exit, where can we go? We have no future.'"

Sometimes called Spain's Ireland because of its Celtic origins, Galicia is a four-province region of verdant, hilly land, geographically cut off from the rest of the country by poor communications and a rugged mountain range ringing its eastern flank and its southern border with Portugal.

Since pre-historic times, Galicia has been characterised by a social and economic structure not usual in the rest of Spain — thousands of tiny, isolated but tightly knit hamlets where nearly all the resident peasants owned a small piece of not-so-fertile land.

Subsistence farming remains the norm in much of Galicia's interior today.

"Paulino had been extremely worried about someone taking his land, but he faced no threat of any kind and had normal relations with neighbours," said Sergio Vazquez Yebra, Fernandez's lawyer and mayor of the nearby town of Chantada.

The village is "a world subject to drastic transformations," columnist Carlos Luis Rodriguez wrote in La Voz de Galicia, the region's leading daily.

"The crime... is in part an expression of the daily dramas of rural Galicia that stuns us because they shatter our ideal of the Bucolic village," Rodriguez wrote.

"The Galician village is a genuine pressure cooker where all kinds of conflicts simmer under a low fire and where the modern and the ancestral crash into each other as if upon a breakwater," he said.

Between 1950 and 1970, the region of 3 million people underwent a rapid but incomplete industrialisation, mainly involving shipbuilding and steel plants on the northern and western Atlantic coasts.

"It appears clearly to have been an attack of madness." Yet it's a paradigmatic incident, a sort of death cry of a rural society of elderly people with a tightly held conviction that their culture has no future.

Smokestack industries

But more than 20,000 high-paying jobs were lost in these smokestack industries through drastic restructuring forced by Spain's decade-long economic recession that did not end until 1984.

Galicia contributes less than 6 per cent to Spain's gross national product, and agriculture still dominates the local economy.

Potatoes, corn, grapes and cabbage are the principal crops, and the dairy industry provides 25 per cent of Spain's milk. But the small farms are not productive, employing three times as many people as the national norm to produce less.

There are more farm workers

— 460,000 — in Galicia than in Belgium, Denmark, Ireland or the Netherlands, according to ministry of agriculture figures.

Spain's entry two years ago into the 12-nation European Economic Community (EEC) sparked some hope of an economic regeneration for the region. But Santiago de Compostela University economics Professor Alberto Meixide said nothing great has happened yet.

"On the one hand, the EEC quotas in its agricultural programme represent a certain guarantee for the sale of farmers' products," he said. "But on the other hand, many dairy farmers had to cut back planned production increases due to EEC plans to reduce their already-bloated stocks."

Fernandez's obsession with his land rang true to local residents' fabled ties to the earth and their legendary longing for it after they had immigrated to the western hemisphere.

An estimated 1 million Galicians, haunted by the specter of a dark future, have left Spain this century, first for Latin America and since the 1950s for France and West Germany.

Among the best-known sons of Galicia or its immigrants to Latin America are Cuban leader Fidel Castro and Argentine President Raul Alfonsin.

Other Spaniards see Galicians as melancholy, broodingly pessimistic people, obsessed with death and witchcraft, with a cunning but contradictory nature. One popular saying goes: "If you see a Gallego on a staircase, you can never tell if he's going up or coming down."

The region has produced a number of national political leaders in the last two centuries, but none made very much of an effort to promote development in his home region. Gen. Francisco Franco, who ruled Spain with an iron hand from 1939 until his death in 1975, was from the Galician city of El Ferrol.

"While Galicians sometimes exaggerate their love for their homeland, in many cases when they move to other parts of the country, they identify themselves more with Spain than with Galicia and have a love-hate relationship with their birthplace," Vazquez Yebra said.

Can tobacco be used to fight cancer?

RNA and hereditary command

By Lee Siegel
The Associated Press

IRVINE, California — Tobacco plants may be enlisted in the war on cancer through genetic engineering that spurs them to produce anti-cancer drugs, sunscreen and other useful chemicals, an executive said recently.

"It's a way to use tobacco for products other than cigarettes for smoking," said geneticist Robert L. Erwin, President of Biosource Genetics Corp., a privately held company backed by venture capitalists.

"This technology might be a way to reduce the cost of producing many medically important chemicals."

Erwin said the Vacaville, California, company has applied for patents on a method of genetically engineering tobacco plants so they can produce various desired products.

Biosource genetics also wants to patent the process to help make melanin, a natural skin pigment that might be used as a more effective sunscreen to prevent skin cancer from ultraviolet sunlight.

Indoor experiments

Experiments so far have been performed indoors, where tobacco plants and cells successfully produced two enzymes to test the method, as well as an enzyme that helps make melanin, Erwin said during the American cancer society's annual seminar for science writers.

Within 12, the privately held company hopes to conduct field work. Tobacco genetically engineered to produce the anti-cancer drug interleukin-2 and serum albumin, a major protein in blood that is used as a supplement in transfusions.

Erwin said other potential products of genetically altered tobacco include an insecticide, a substance that allows the time-release of flavours in foods and fragrances in perfumes, enzymes to help make paper and reduce cholesterol levels in foods, and other cancer drugs such as interferon and vincristine.

Biosource genetics used tobacco plants because they are well-understood, easily manipulated and serve as plant researchers' equivalent of the laboratory mouse, Erwin said. The company was considering the same method to genetically alter pepper, potato, and tomato plants, he added.

The company's effort to convert tobacco plants into living factories for the cheap mass production of industrial chemicals, medicines and cosmetics drew criticism from an environmental group. But it also garnered interest from a tobacco growers group and cautious praise from the former director of the National Cancer Institute.

Dr. Vincent T. DeVita Jr., who left NCI last year to become physician-in-chief at New York's Memorial Sloan-Kettering cancer center, is really kind of cute.

"It's a very interesting idea," DeVita said. "It sounds too good to be true, but looks real enough to pursue."

Andrew Kimbrell, attorney and policy director for the anti-biotechnology foundation on economic trends, said a substance sprayed on tobacco plants to produce change what they produce "could go to other plants with results unknown. We have real concerns about what other plants it might affect."

Erwin said his company's method is safe because the genetic-engineering spray degrades quickly, creates only a temporary genetic change in the tobacco plants, and the changes are not passed from plant to plant or from one generation of plants to the next.

Reginald Lester, managing director of the tobacco growers' information committee in Raleigh, North Carolina, said "growers would be interested in taking a look at this if it could be shown to be commercially viable."

Biosource genetics alters tobacco plants by spraying them with molecules of RNA — part of the fundamental hereditary information of all living things — taken from the tobacco mosaic virus and encased in a protein coating.

This virus-like substance invades the plant, carrying with it a gene, or hereditary command, that orders production of the desired chemical.

Because the new genetic command dies with the plant, a farmer would plant tobacco, then decide later in the season whether to sell it for cigarettes or spray it to produce a medicine or industrial chemical. Erwin said a different spray could be used the next season to make the tobacco produce another substance.

Focus on People

She has the whole world in her hands

By Mariam M. Shahin

This week Focus on People tells Um Ibrahim about how she became an economic asset to her family and how she enabled other women in Jordan to do the same.

AS she talks Um Ibrahim irons embroidered pieces of cloth. Her iron board is a piece of wood on the floor. At 60 she is an agile mother of eight. Her three room workshop is filled to the ceiling with shelves of embroidered burlap and endless boxes of DMC thread. An Arab-American artist who has come to buy embroidered cushions from her workshop is about to leave with four cushion covers under his arm. "Isn't she wonderful, such an active woman, and at her age! she is preserving our past, people in the States will love these." Um Ibrahim just smiles as he walks out wishing her a "nice day."

For Um Ibrahim life has not been full of too many nice days. A native of Beit Dajan — Jaffa, she and her family moved to Jordan in 1958, after a ten year stay in Nabulus. Her husband, Abu Ibrahim, was an Arabic and mathematics teacher, first in Beit Dajan, then Nabulus, and after coming to Amman he taught at the Islamic College and later on at government schools. "For twenty years I raised my eight children (four girls and four boys), while Abu Ibrahim was our sole wage earner. They were a hard twenty years. We moved a lot and there never seemed to be quite enough to go around. The children's education has always been a priority for me. I insisted on putting them into nursery schools and private schools, that was a lot for eight children on a teacher's salary. But it paid off, every moment of it, I'm very proud of my children."

Um Ibrahim feels very strongly about the education of her daughters in particular. She points out that she was one of the few girls in her village who had the privilege of learning how to read and write. This was at a time when literacy of women in the Middle East and world-wide was minimal when compared to today's standards. She asserts that her four daughters, who received university degrees in physics, computer science and administration, were instrumental in encouraging her to make the embroidery workshop her livelihood. "Today they give me both moral and financial support, they are my backbone in every sense."

It was not until the early 1970's that the traditional handicraft of embroidery was thought of as commercially viable. A group of women, associated with the Aidi Handicraft Centre hired village women to repair old dresses and to copy the traditional design of the Bethlehem dress.

"Then came the opportunity we had been waiting for: The Royal Jordanian airline — Alia at the time — made a very large order of embroidered coasters and hand towels. The order was in the amount of 17,000 pieces: I made 2,500 coasters on my own, Mariam Abu Laban, Leila Jerjes and Basema Khaleel were also actively involved. For all of us who had begun to think of traditional embroidery, as a channel to become entrepreneurs, this commercial success marked the beginning of a breakthrough. The women who did most of the actual work were becoming aware that they could improve their economic condition by working in this field. An embroidered dress receives an average of JD 8 to 10 for every cushion."

It takes her an average of two weeks to finish embroidering a cushion.

"Many women were afraid that their eyesight would be weakened as a result of such work. However, those who want to work will work. I've been embroidering for 40 years and my eyes are fine," she said as her big, brown, warm eyes shone through her thick spectacles.

Almost every day of the week between 7-7:30 a.m. women from camps all over Amman, Jabel Taj, Jabel Nuzha, and Jabel Aj Akhdar come to her modest workshop in a side street in the Haouz area of Jabel Amman. They either bring pieces of embroidery that they have completed or Um Ibrahim gives them prepared work. "Clients often tell us what they want in terms of colour, schemes and the size of the cushions and so forth, but often the girls come up with beautiful designs of their own. In other words in terms of design and colour schemes we always have new blood in our work."

There are anywhere from 150 to 200 women who deal with Um Ibrahim on a regular basis. Whether married or single they are wage earners and make significant contributions to the welfare of their families. "The older generation of women are more willing than the young to work on pieces of embroidery. They have more patience and greater knowledge of traditional designs. However, many young women are not finding employment these days or feel they can not make due on the meager salaries they earn."

Um Ibrahim has no time to "socialise," her work and her 16 grandchildren leave no time for that. She never sleeps before midnight and is up at six every morning. She suffers from rheumatism, but says she has no time to go to the doctor. "When will she stop working then?" "When my body stops following orders."

Saudis appear ready to give backing to Iraq and Egypt

NICOSIA (R) — Saudi Arabia appears to have taken a strategic decision to assist the debt-laden economies of Iraq and Egypt, bankers in the Gulf said Wednesday.

But one senior banker cautioned against expecting fast results. "Do not expect anything right now, immediately. These things take years and Egypt's economy is in bad shape," he said. The bankers said King Fahd appeared to have given the green light to banks and businessmen in Saudi Arabia in remarks he made to the weekly cabinet meeting in Riyadh Monday night. The king said after visiting Iraq and Egypt last week both countries were witnessing major positive changes. He said Egypt was experiencing an industrial renaissance "on the right track." Diplomats and bankers saw his remarks as approval for banks and investors to help Egypt after an Arab boycott over its 1979 peace treaty with Israel, and to fund reconstruction projects in Iraq after last August's ceasefire in its war with Iran. "To help Iraq and now Egypt is a strategic investment and part of Saudi Arabia's long-term policy," one Gulf-based banker commented. A banker suggested Riyadh might arrange soft loans for Cairo and encourage the import of Egyptian goods. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak is currently in Washington for talks with U.S. officials and the International Monetary Fund partly focused on Egypt's need for early assistance. Diplomats in the region said Mubarak had pressed Saudi Arabia and other oil-rich Gulf states to try to meet some of Egypt's immediate cash needs, which would enable it to repay overdue debts and regain international creditworthiness.

Egypt is currently burdened with a $43 billion foreign debt. The Saudi government-controlled Al-Yamamah magazine said Saudi-Egyptian talks had focused on forging economic ties that would go much further than "offering loans and grants to a higher level of effective participation in building the economic structure of Egypt and promoting Saudi Arabian investments."

Arab diplomats said Iraq presented King Fahd during his Baghdad visit with a list of urgent projects. The kingdom was one of Iraq's main political and financial backers during the eight-year Gulf war.

Bankers estimate Iraq owes its Arab supporters, primarily Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, some $40 billion. It also has a $23 billion commercial debt in addition to a $9 billion military debt it owes the Soviet Union.

IIH laid to rest

New Islamic bank in Jordan to start operations in summer

AMMAN (Petra) — The Central Bank of Jordan (CBJ) announced Wednesday that the new National Islamic Bank (NIB) will have a JD 7 million capital and that it will commence operations in the coming two to three months. The announcement noted that the NIB will serve as a successor to the Islamic Investment House (IIH) and referred to two earlier decisions in December 1988 and March 1989 concerning the transformation.

It said that the NIB will operate in accordance with Islamic law and will be governed by a seven-member board of directors two of whom will represent the CBJ. According to the announcement, the main shareholders of the new entity will be: The Jordan Bank Limited, the Jordan Engineers Association, the Orphans' Fund and the Queen Alia Social Welfare.

It said that nearly JD 1 million will be owned by the old shareholders of the IIH, in accordance with conditions set by the National Economic Security Committee. The announcement said that upon recommendation from the committee, the CBJ has provided a loan to the new bank to handle the earlier losses incurred by the IIH and that the CBJ will continue to provide assistance to the NIB to help it collect dues and loans offered by the IIH to the public.

Due to new JD exchange rates

Jordanian agricultural exports increase

AMMAN (Petra) — Jordan's agricultural exports to Arab Gulf states have increased and the Kingdom has regained its traditional markets in other countries largely due to the new exchange rate of the Jordanian dinar which encourages other nations to import from Jordan, Supply Minister Fayez Tarawneh announced in a lecture at Al Ahli Club in Amman.

The minister said the Jordanian agricultural sector is the most important economic sector in the Kingdom as it earned JD 140 million in hard currency last year, up from JD 25 million in 1973. However, he said, the agricultural sector faces a number of difficulties largely due to the lack of proper information systems to provide data on the general needs of the markets here and abroad, the diminishing number of workers in agriculture and the fact that several authorities still control the agricultural sector in the Kingdom.

The question of food security for Jordan, the minister noted, hinges on three factors: Production which is related to exports; imports of required foodstuffs which cannot be produced locally; and consumption.

He said the government has been very keen to promote production by backing farmers' endeavours, providing irrigation services and water, granting loans through the various concerned organisations and credit institutions and supporting the functions of agricultural cooperatives. Above all, he added, the government has created proper facilities to help farmers market their products here and abroad. The public sector continues to import certain commodities like apples and garlic to meet the needs of local consumers and the Ministry of Supply has been entrusted also to import frozen meat, fish and poultry in addition to fresh meat, cheese, wheat, sugar and rice.

The ministry also maintains quantities of cereals sufficient for the Kingdom's needs for at least six months, the minister noted. He said the ministry imports nearly 450,000 tonnes of wheat and buys locally-produced cereals at subsidised prices to encourage local farmers to increase output and help achieve food security for the Kingdom.

In the past year, Tarawneh noted, the government imported $65 million worth of fresh meat and is now in the process of importing frozen meat from New Zealand and additional quantities of frozen poultry from France and other countries to meet local needs.

The minister also said that over the past three months, the government imported 5,000 tonnes of animal feed compared to 1,500 tonnes last year so as to provide local stockbreeders with their requirements.

The minister said that the Ministry of Supply interferences whenever is necessary to provide foodstuffs for local consumption and to maintain stability in prices.

Central banks and dealers battle over dollar's level

NEW YORK (R) — Central banks and currency traders are battling over the appropriate level for the dollar as they wait for a slowdown in the U.S. economy and a drop in American interest rates to slow its rise. The dollar's rally has been temporarily halted amid signs of a cooling U.S. economy, the Bank of Japan's intervention and a warning from the Group of Seven (G-7) industrial democracies that further strength in the currency will be opposed, dealers said. "The fight will continue" between central banks and market participants, said Liliana Nealon, senior dealer at Union Bank of Switzerland. "The dollar will continue to rise and they (the G-7) will have to adjust the range. It's a matter of time."

The dollar has been in heavy global demand due to firm U.S. interest rates — which enhance the value of dollar-denominated assets — and a persistent flow of direct foreign investment into the United States. "Central banks have to sell dollars if they don't want it to rise further," said a dealer at a New York money centre bank. "Over a period, supply and demand sets the dollar's level. That is the market fundamental." Central banks dumped over $10 billion on the market last summer to brake the dollar's rally, dealers said. Last autumn the banks bought some $10 billion to stop the dollar's steep fall, which came amid doubts that president-elect Bush could cut the massive federal budget deficit. The Federal Reserve launched an unusual attack on the dollar last Thursday, buying yen for the first time in more than three years. The Bank of Japan mimicked the action Monday, also a first since November 1985, dealers said. The intervention worked: The Bank of Japan underscored the G-7 warning and the dollar fell more than two pennies and one yen. It dropped Monday to 1.8750 marks from 1.8975, and to 131.75 yen from 132.75. But dealers wonder how long the dollar can be kept down, as the central banks' dollar sales — though packing a strong psychological punch — have been light so far. The dollar will face tougher uphill resistance if the G-7 can agree on raising interest rates in West Germany and Japan, said Robert White, foreign exchange manager at First Interstate Bank of Los Angeles. And many dealers believe central banks will win any contest of wills against the dollar. "The market will test a higher dollar. However, central banks will win overall, as the track record shows," said Peter Gloyne, senior dealer at First National Bank of Chicago. While central banks must continue intervening to curb the steady commercial demand for the dollar, dealers said, the U.S. economy's future moves could end such a stalemate. If the domestic economy slows without causing a recession, domestic interest rates — and thus the dollar — could fall. "If the (U.S.) economy slows down, the dollar will come near a turning point," said Shigeru Tokunaga, foreign exchange manager at Fuji Bank's New York branch.

World Bank, IMF push Brady plan

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.S. President George Bush's plan to reduce the Third World's debt won key endorsements Tuesday from the two international agencies expected to implement the strategy. Officials from the 151-nation International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank both pledged quick action to speed debt relief to struggling nations in the developing world. Michel Camdessus, the IMF's managing director, and Barber Conable, president of the World Bank, said they recognised the need for urgency in dealing with the debt crisis. Conable said that any delay "could be devastating" because of the expectations created by the Bush administration's proposals for reducing the Third World's $1.3 trillion debt. In a speech to the final session of the spring meetings of the IMF and the World Bank, Conable said the global bank had created a joint task force to work with the IMF to speed implementation of the new debt-relief programme.

Foreign investments in Sri Lanka increase

COLOMBO (AP) — Foreign investors are steadily pumping millions of dollars into Sri Lanka, despite the continuing Tamil insurgency and an escalating violent backlash by Sinhalese militants, officials say. Foreign investors are lured, despite the violence, by the Indian Ocean island nation's trade liberalisation and its proximity to major land and sea routes.

At least 103 projects, worth about $932.3 million, were finalised last year, said Shalini Dantarayana, a spokeswoman for the Greater Colombo Economic Commission. The commission, one of the two institutions handling foreign investment in Sri Lanka, attracted a record 26 projects in 1988, Dantarayana said.

Israel turns to capitalism to ease $26b debt burden

TEL AVIV (R) — Some states may shrink at the thought of being bought out by foreigners, but Israel is waiting with open arms for cash and knowhow from foreign investors. The Jewish state plans to sell off about 20 state-owned companies, including Israel Aircraft Industries and El Al Airlines, in a move signalling a new pragmatism in economic policy, government officials and analysts say. "What Israel needs is less government interference and I believe the only chance is to integrate with international markets and pull in multinational companies," said Adi Amoral, who until recently was deputy finance minister in charge of privatisation. Ironically, the privatisation drive is spearheaded by Finance Minister Shimon Peres, leader of the Labour party which built Israel on austere socialist principles in 1948. Nowadays he tells visitors: "To distribute money as a socialist, one must raise it as a capitalist."

If successful, the scheme will help Israel to pay off foreign debts of more than $25.5 billion, owed mainly to the United States, and give its economy a new face. Four of the country's 10 largest companies are state-owned firms due for privatisation. Revenue from 159 state-owned companies in 1987, the last year for which results are available, was $7.6 billion or 23 per cent of the gross domestic product. They accounted for 16 per cent of exports and employed five per cent of the workforce. The firms most suitable for sale are well-known and profitable, attracting serious consideration from major American and European investment banks which are competing to find buyers and underwrite potential share offers. The first phase of privatisation is likely to consist of direct sales to foreign investors rather than public offers because of the limited capacity of the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. The government is training its sights on a specific type of foreign involvement.

"We are not just looking for banks to put money in the companies. We want investors in related fields who will bring special knowhow to develop our firms," said Zeev Rafna, head of the finance ministry team coordinating the sales. Israel's privatisation programme, drawn up by the U.S.-based First Boston Corp. Investment Bank, was presented in April 1988. It calls for the sale as soon as possible of three firms — Israel Chemicals Ltd., Oil Refineries Ltd., and Elita Electronics Industries, a subsidiary of Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI). Business sources said IAI would report a $15 million loss for 1988 after losing $96.8 million in 1987. Shares in IAI, Israel's largest defence contractor, would be floated on the Tel Aviv and foreign stock exchanges in a few years, the sources said. Foreign investment in Israel's defence industries is not unprecedented, but due to its sensitivity First Boston proposed the government retain a majority stake in Elita and proprietary rights over marketing information about its products. A team from Trust Boston arrived in Israel recently to set a timetable for the sale of half of Israel Chemicals, the largest state-owned group worth around $800 million. El Al, another candidate for privatisation, will report a profit for the third consecutive year in 1988.

SPORTS IN BRIEF

Celtic beats Liverpool 5-3 in Dubai

DUBAI (AP) — Glasgow Celtic of Scotland defeated England's Liverpool 5-3 on penalties to win the Dubai Champion's Cup after scores were 1-1 at the final whistle. Celtic led 1-0 at half-time through a 12th minute goal by skipper Mark McGee. Liverpool, paced by international forward John Barnes and skipper Ronnie Whelan, fought their way back into the game with some crisp passing. John Aldridge scored the equaliser in the 73rd with a scorching shot that sent Celtic goalie Pat Bonner diving in vain. Shots by Andy Walker and Lex Bailie put Celtic a decisive two goals up in the penalty shoot-out. The brisk-paced match was watched by a crowd of 7,000 at the Al Maktoum stadium. The Dubai Cup match is contested by the English and Scottish league champions. It was last played in 1987, when Glasgow Rangers beat Everton on penalties.

Another Canadian admits steroid use

TORONTO (R) — Retired Canadian sprinter Cheryl Thibedeau Tuesday said she had been injected with anabolic steroids by Ben Johnson's coach, Charlie Francis, and doctor, George (Mario) Astaphan. Thibedeau told the Canadian inquiry into drug use in amateur sport that she had been injected with the performance-enhancing drugs more than 50 times a year before the 1988 Seoul Olympics. Thibedeau said she was inoculated with a thick, milky white substance called estragol, also known as furazabol, by Astaphan, the team doctor.

Graf and Navratilova advance

HILTON HEAD ISLAND, S.C. (R) — Top-seeded Steffi Graf coasted through her second-round match while second-seeded Martina Navratilova struggled Tuesday in a $300,000 women's tennis tournament. Graf, seeking her third title here, had trouble adjusting her powerful groundstrokes to the slow clay court but the West German still defeated South African Ros Fairbank 6-4, 6-3. Navratilova, the defending champion and three-time winner, had her hands full with Laura Gildemeister of Peru in the first two sets before triumphing 6-4, 4-6, 6-0. Third-seeded Zina Garrison of the United States withdrew because of a groin pull which she suffered last week. She was replaced by Andrea Holikova of Czechoslovakia, the highest ranked loser from the qualifying rounds. Fourth-seeded Natalia Zvereva of the Soviet Union and seventh-seeded Arantxa Sanchez of Spain were easy second round winners, while Jana Pospisilova of Czechoslovakia upset 12th-seeded Raffaella Reggi of Italy 7-5, 6-4.

EEC seeks to make a name at Olympic games

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) — If the EEC commission has its way, athletes from the 12 community nations may display the EEC colours — 12 gold stars in a field of royal blue — alongside their national ones at the 1992 winter and summer Olympic games. The idea of giving the European Economic Community some profile at the Olympics was discussed Tuesday by EEC commission President Jacques Delors and organisers of the winter games at Albertville, France, and the summer games at Barcelona.

Romanians ward off Turkish fans at border

BUCHAREST (R) — Romania has ordered 3,000 extra police and soldiers to watch over angry Turkish fans who arrived for Wednesday's European Cup semi-final tie to learn they had no tickets.

Organisers said only 120 of the 1,200 Turkish fans who reached the Romanian capital — hundreds were turned back at the border — would be given tickets for the match between Steaua Bucharest and Galatasaray of Turkey.

Galatasaray officials said in Istanbul that Romania had allocated 1,500 tickets to fans from Turkey when 10,000 wanted to support the first Turkish club to reach the semi-finals of the European Cup.

The Romanian Football Federation said it had received over 190,000 requests for tickets after it had already announced that all seats for the 30,000 capacity stadium had been sold out.

Tickets were changing hands on the black market Tuesday for 10,000 lei ($1,100), about four times the average monthly salary in Romania.

Galatasaray striker Tanju Colak, 26, winner of last year's Golden Boot Award who has scored 19 goals in the Turkish championship this season so far and six in this season's European Cup, gave his team a 40-60 chance to reach the final.

"It will be very tough and an exceptional achievement if we do not lose heavily on Wednesday," he said. "But we might still have a chance to turn things around at home."

"We are 50 per cent stronger when we play in front of our own fans. But we are already satisfied with reaching the semifinals and we can play relaxed." In Istanbul Turkish newspapers estimated 500 vehicles were turned back at the Romanian border.

Sweden snatch 5-0 table tennis win

20-year Chinese reign ended

DORTMUND, West Germany (Agencies) — Sweden shocked defending titlists China 5-0 late Tuesday, winning the men's team title at the world table tennis championships.

Sweden's victory came despite a 15-minute disruption in the fourth match when China's two-time world champion, Jiang Jialiang, complained about a call against him and refused to continue until the umpire was changed. He got his way but still lost to Jan-Ove Waldner, ranked no. 2 in the world.

By that time Sweden had the match well in hand with European champion Mikael Appelgren, and Jorgen Persson, no. 6 in the world, joining Waldner. Sweden took the crown after losing to the Chinese the last three times at the world championships.

The last time the Chinese lost a men's title was in 1979. The Chinese women won the team title Monday for the eighth straight time.

At the 1987 world championships, China took six of the seven titles, losing only the women's doubles.

But the Swedes denied the Chinese the men's crown in the team championships this year. Appelgren beat Jiang in the first match, 21-10, 21-15, 21-15, to set Sweden's winning form. Jiang, slightly hampered by a hamstring injury, attacked frequently but Appelgren was able to hold off the drives and take advantage of Jiang's slight loss of mobility.

Jiang complained several times when the umpire, Fritz Eigler of West Germany, called faults on his for not having his racket above the table at the start of the service.

Waldner fell to Teng Yi in the first game of the best match, 22-24. But with brilliant defensive lobs and surprise backhand drives he took the next two games, 21-19, 21-17, to put Sweden up 2-0.

Persson woo another three-game encounter with Cheo Longcan, the top doubles player in the world. Persson took the contest, 22-24, 21-16, 21-12.

In the fourth match Jiang and Waldner split the first two games. With Waldner leading, 8-5, and Jiang serving again, the umpire called another fault against him.

Jiang complained again and asked for Eigler to be changed. He then called for the tournament referee, Johann Kleewein of Austria, and did not continue.

At one point, Kleewein said the match was over and was ready to forfeit it to the Swedish player.

But Jiang continued to protest and finally an impromptu meeting of the technical committee upheld the point against Jiang but changed the umpire to Horst Braum of West Germany. Jiang then resumed playing.

Waldner went on to take the third game, 21-16, and put Sweden on the verge of winning.

Then Appelgren beat Cheo in the fifth match, 21-17, 21-16, to win the championship for Sweden and was awarded a toss in the air by his victorious teammates.

China have lost only two men's team finals since 1971 and have defeated the Swedes in the last three.

A French comedy of errors ...

PARIS (R) — France's most popular current farce may still lack a title but the script looks promising enough to be considered for a run at Paris's Opera Comique.

A largely bewildered audience of soccer fans is avidly following the bizarre daily developments of a saga variously known as the Tigana case, the Bez-Tapie affair or, more prosaically, the French Football Crisis.

The plot, intrinsically somewhat thin, has been more or less submerged in a stream of accusations, insults, threats of legal action, resignations, appeals reversals of previous decisions and even an intervention by the sports minister himself.

To begin to understand what it is all about, you must first study the programme notes on the leading characters.

They are — not strictly in order of appearance — a black soccer professional, played by Jean Tigana, a socialist millionaire entrepreneur, played by Bernard Tapie, and a right-wing politician, club boss and 'would-be saviour of French football' whose part will be taken by Claude Bez.

Jean Fournet-Fayard and Jean Sadoul have supporting parts as the presidents of the French Football Federation and league and, because no show is complete without a female lead, Odile Lancau will play Fournet-Fayard's secretary.

The action takes place in France during the spring of 1989. Bez, president of French first division soccer club Bordeaux and easily recognised by his large droopy moustache, has recently persuaded arch-enemy Tapie, boss of the Marseille team, to lend him disgraced player Eric Cantona until the end of the season.

Transfers are banned in France after the mid-winter break but Bez has taken advantage of a new rule allowing clubs a dispensation if a regular first-team player is seriously injured. Cantona, who had been suspended by Marseille for throwing his shirt at a referee in a charity game, takes the place of injured Bordeaux midfielder Bernard Genghini.

The curtain rises for act 1. The suave and well-groomed Tapie calls on Bez to return the favour as his Seogegale forward Abdoulaye Diallo has been badly hurt in a cup match. The two agree that experienced international midfielder Tigana, 33, will be loaned to title-chasing Marseille.

To maintain the suspense, the audience is not told why political and temperamental opposites Tapie and Bez, normally given to public exchanges of insults, have suddenly become so chummy.

Act II. The French league executive meets in Paris and decides not to allow the loan of Tigana who is already with the Marseille team on the way to a match in Metz.

Though there is nothing in its statutes to prevent the move, the executive, plainly worried by the way to rich clubs are manipulating the system, rules that a team which has benefitted from a dispensation cannot itself lend a player.

Act III. Tapie and Bez cry foul and a furor breaks out in which everyone insults everyone else. Tapie announces in the French capital that he is referring the matter to a civil court and demands the result of Marseille's 3-1 defeat in Cannes be annulled.

His argument is eloquently presented. Cannes were playing Yugoslav full-back Zoran Vujovic, another player loaned out by Bordeaux after they had taken Cantona on board. If Vujovic, then why not Tigana, he says.

The scene switches to Bordeaux. Bez, with eyes as big and sad as those of a bloodhound refused a second helping of dinner, gives a news conference to announce his resignation as quartermaster of the French national team, a post he took up last November after being instrumental in the putsch to replace national trainer Henri Michel with Michel Platini.

He roundly accuses Fournet-Fayard and Sadoul of incompetence, claims Lancau is a wily secretary who wields the real power at the federation and implies a racist decision was made because of Tigana's colour.

Act IV. Fournet-Fayard and Sadoul hit back and sports minister Roger Bambuck, alarmed at the damage being inflicted on the image of French soccer, particularly as France is bidding for the 1998 World Cup finals, calls all parties together to sort out the mess.

It is unclear how many more acts there will be though it looks

"French football... will reduce people who love the game to tears. Recent developments are less and less comic and more and more tragic."

set to run and run despite a daily panning by the critics.

The sports paper L'Equipe, in its review, said: "French football is in the process of turning from a grotesque situation to a sadness which will reduce people who love the game to tears. Recent developments are less and less comic and more and more tragic."

Poland, Solidarity sign historic pact

WARSAW (R) — The Polish government and opposition signed agreements Wednesday on unprecedented reforms that will end the communist party's monopoly of power.

The signing took place at the final session of marathon government-opposition talks that brought agreement on legalising the banned Solidarity union and injecting an element of democracy into the nation's political institutions.

"We are entering a new stage on the road to democracy but we still have a long way to go," Solidarity leader Lech Walesa said as he entered the meeting in an 18th century Warsaw palace.

The reforms are designed to pull Poland out of economic and political crisis.

They will give the opposition a role in parliament. Many opposition members were imprisoned under martial law which General Wojciech Jaruzelski imposed in 1981 to suppress Solidarity.

Solidarity is expected to obtain legal registration later this month for the first time since 1981 and many of its leaders are likely to enter parliament in June under an electoral pact with the government.

The union's leadership overcame last-minute hesitation and signed the package despite failing to win an all-party agreement on wage indexation to compensate for soaring inflation.

The official OPZZ unions pulled out of the agreement earlier and Solidarity accused them of acting for Communist Party hardliners in a bid to torpedo the reforms.

Solidarity spokesman Janusz Onyszkiewicz had said Tuesday the hardliners were behind a refusal by the communist-led OPZZ unions to accept a compromise deal thrashed out at eight weeks of talks to create an index tying wage rises to inflation.

"There is an obvious political calculation of a certain tendency within the party to break up the talks," Onyszkiewicz said at a news conference.

In exchange, Solidarity has agreed to discourage strikes and try to hold down popular unrest while the authorities tackle inflation, shortages and economic backwardness and attempt to switch Poland's economy to a market-oriented system.

Government and opposition leaders have warned that growing economic hardship could bring popular unrest which might upset the deal they have worked out to save Poland from upheaval.

The deal includes what Solidarity calls a new "infrastructure of democracy" — more independence for judges, some opposition access to the media, liberalisation of the right to form associations and political clubs and an official pledge to establish local government independence.

The most striking feature is what communist leader General Wojciech Jaruzelski calls the move towards "socialist parliamentary democracy."

Under a government-opposition electoral pact the opposition will enter the Sejm (lower house) in June for the first time with a 35 per cent share of the seats.

The communists have simultaneously agreed to give up their 53 per cent majority in the Sejm.

Lech Walesa

Political sources say they will accept 38 per cent of the seats although their coalition with allied groups will have a 65 per cent majority.

Equally striking is a constitutional reform creating a 100-member Senate (upper house) which will be the East Bloc's first democratically-elected parliamentary institution.

Soviet seats still undecided

MOSCOW (R) — Results from the Soviet parliamentary elections last month show 274 seats still undecided, with a second round of voting due in the next few weeks, TASS news agency reported Tuesday.

Results across the country from the first contested elections in 70 years showed a clear swing of public opinion against the establishment. Many senior Communist Party, government and military figures failed to get elected.

In those seats where more than two candidates stood, with none taking 50 per cent of the poll, a second round will be held April 9 between the two most successful candidates.

In seats where only one or two candidates stood, and still failed to take the necessary 50 per cent, a new election with different candidates will take place May 14.

The results, announced by the Central Election Commission, were also declared invalid in three seats where turnout was below 50 per cent.

TASS did not name the constituencies, and it was not clear if the low turnout was the result of boycotts, held in some districts where only a single candidate stood.

Despite electoral setbacks for some senior figures, TASS said 87.6 of those elected to the new Congress of People's Deputies were party members.

Of the elected deputies 17.1 per cent are women, 18.6 per cent industrial workers and 11.2 per cent peasants.

The Congress, which will in turn elect from its members a new Supreme Soviet or parliament with real executive powers in contrast to its rubber-stamp predecessor, must convene by May 26, two months after the election.

Defiant Nujoma refuses to pull out

HARARE (R) — South West Africa's People's Organisation (SWAPO) President Sam Nujoma refused Wednesday to withdraw his guerrilla fighters from northern Namibia, where nearly 200 have been killed in five days of fighting with South African forces.

Nujoma accused the United Nations peacekeeping troops of negligence and South Africa of trying to sabotage Namibia's planned independence from Pretoria.

He told reporters who asked if he would withdraw his guerrillas at United Nations request: "We have been fighting in Namibia for 23 years. It is an insult to our intelligence."

He again denied that SWAPO fighters had crossed into Namibia from Angola, a South African charge largely accepted by the U.N.

South African Foreign Minister P. W. Botha Tuesday delivered an ultimatum to the United Nations to curb SWAPO, or he would halt Namibia's countdown to independence unless the U.N. acted "within hours."

Nujoma said U.N. reports backing up the charge of cross-border infiltration "are based on information extracted from sick people in bed" — a reference to the questioning of wounded SWAPO guerrillas.

"This claim by South Africa that SWAPO crossed April 1 is a lie," he said.

Asked why he believed SWAPO guerrillas were allowed to be in northern Namibia, he said U.N. Security Council Resolution 435 categorically stated that both South African troops and SWAPO forces would be confined to bases April 1 by UNTAG, the U.N.'s monitoring force.

"I was one of those who negotiated this plan in 1977 and 1978," he said. Resolution 435 is the blueprint for Namibia's U.N.-supervised transition from April 1 to democracy and independence.

He acknowledged that under Geneva protocols signed by South Africa, Angola and Cuba last year, SWAPO forces inside Angola were to be withdrawn north of the 16th parallel, 160 kilometres from the border.

"But I wanted to stick to 435," he said.

Asked where SWAPO had bases in northern Namibia, he replied: "A guerrilla fighter does not have a base."

He said it should have been up to the U.N. forces to allocate places for the guerrillas to assemble in safety and be given food and water.

He accused U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar of negligence in failing to have sufficient UNTAG forces deployed by April 1.

He said he still had faith in the U.N. but replied "no comment" when asked if he wanted the dismissal of its special representative in Windhoek, Martti Ahtisaari.

Nujoma said he did not know how much progress had been achieved in talks in Luanda about a ceasefire.

He shrugged off South Africa's threat to suspend the independence process: "As far as our freedom is concerned there will be no compromise," he said.

He repeated a call made to ambassadors of the five Security Council permanent members to meet and authorise an immediate increase in the size of UNTAG to 7,500 men.

Nujoma disclosed that he had asked the five powers to supply planes to fly more U.N. troops into Namibia.

Gorbachev rejects export of revolution

HAVANA (R) — Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, urging a political solution to the conflict in Central America, used a Havana forum Tuesday to issue a ringing renunciation of export of revolution — and of counter-revolution.

In a speech to Cuba's parliament, Gorbachev also called for an end to all arms supplies to the region and rejected U.S. assertions that Latin America was part of its "backyard," saying Washington still seemed tempted to use force in the area.

"We are resolutely against any form of export of revolution, or of counter-revolution," the Kremlin chief declared as President Fidel Castro — accused by the United States of using military aid to promote his brand of communism — listened attentively.

The problems of Central America, he said, "can only be solved by political means... through a Latin American solution on the basis of a balance of interest of all the sides involved, without any interference from the outside."

His remarks amounted to a clear rejection of calls from U.S. President Bush that he call a unilateral halt to Soviet military aid to its allies in the area.

On the eve of Gorbachev's arrival Cuban deputy Foreign Minister Raul Roa Kouri said his country had the right to support revolutionaries "because other governments believe they have a right to support counter-revolutionaries," an apparent reference to U.S. aid for Nicaragua's contra rebels.

Gorbachev's speech, his last engagement of a three-day visit to Havana and his first-ever sortie into Latin America, came after he and Castro had signed a friendship treaty halting their two countries' "inextricable friendship and solidarity."

Both denounced what they said were suggestions in the West that they had serious policy differences, and clearly sought to demonstrate in every public appearance that they were on excellent personal and political terms.

"This was a very significant meeting," Gorbachev told reporters at a brief news conference with Castro after the parliamentary session.

"This visit was preceded by a lot of speculation, as though I was coming to see an enemy. I must say this is pure invention."

While Castro, speaking to his parliament before the Soviet leader, attacked U.S. "imperialist" behaviour around the world, although in terms milder than those he uses to a purely home audience, Gorbachev struck a more moderate note.

He called on other developed countries to support proposals he made at the United Nations last December for a 30-year or longer moratorium on Third World financial debts, saying it would "help get the blood vessels of the world economy moving again."

ETA ends truce; Spain still hopeful

MARDID (R) — Basque separatist guerrillas say their three-month-old truce is over, but the Spanish government retains some hope they will not resume attacks and peace talks can go on.

ETA (Basque Homeland and Freedom) said in a communique Tuesday it was ending the truce because the government had not honoured a pledge to negotiate a political settlement in return for an extended ceasefire.

The communique, responding to the government's stand it will talk only about a technical way out for the guerrillas, appeared to dash the best hopes ever for an end to ETA's bloody campaign.

The group has killed more than 600 people in a 21-year war for independence in the northern Basque country. In January it declared a truce which paved the way for peace talks in Algiers between exiled guerrillas and government representatives.

Commenting on the communique, Socialist Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez said hopes that dialogue could continue had to be preserved up to the last moment.

The government has to be extremely cautious until the last moment, he said. "I don't want to endanger what's at stake by saying anything imprudent."

"I'm all more the more cau-ious since I think the chances of the process continuing could be ending," he said.

ETA does carry out an attack. "It will be the full stop" on talks with the group, Gonzalez said.

The Basque regional government said it would not regard the truce as broken unless an attack actually took place.

Security forces were on alert to try to prevent guerrillas crossing into Spain from hideouts in France and Interior Ministry sources said prominent politicians and businessmen had been warned against a possible kidnapping.

The guerrillas said they would resume the talks only if the government acknowledged what they said was agreed in Algiers — that the talks were working towards a negotiated settlement on the group's political demands.

Those include self-determination for the Basque country, the withdrawal of national security forces and the incorporation of neighbouring Navarre into the Basque country.

The government's stance that it will discuss only pardons for individual guerrillas has been backed by political parties in both Madrid and the Basque country, who angrily condemned ETA for ending its truce.

Alaska wildlife battles 'greasy slime' of spill

VALDEZ (R) — Just a fortnight ago the wildlife of Alaska's Port William Sound frolicked in some of North America's purest waters.

Now they are struggling with the greasy slime of more than 10 million gallons of crude oil spilled from the supertanker Exxon Valdez when it hit the rocks of Bligh's reef March 24.

Wildlife experts said Tuesday that even marine animals, birds and fish which had survived the spill would be seriously endangered in coming years.

"It's like the poisoning of African animals, the continuing killing of the South American rain forests, urban sprawl and the killing of sea mammals in high seas," said Jon Lyman of the Alaskan Department of Fish and Game.

The oil slick has spread to more than 2,600 square kilometres — an area the size of Luxembourg — and has reached as far as the Gulf of Alaska while washing ashore on more than 1,200 kilometres of coastline, Lyman said.

Twenty of the 30 species of birds found in the sound area year-round — including Canada geese, mallards, white-winged scoters, surf scoters, harlequin ducks, murres, glaucous-wing gulls and bald eagles — have been discovered covered in oil.

"In these numbers when they are oiled, they look like rocks and they are difficult to see," Lyman told Reuters. "One in 10 is dead and many are being taken by predators such as gulls and eagles or they are carried off by the tide."

The timing of the spill was particularly harmful to fisheries, coming only weeks before hundreds of millions of salmon fry were to be released from hatcheries and ahead of the herring spawning season when most are harvested.

The devastation of these spawning grounds prompted the Alaskan state government to ban herring fishing this year in the sound and to allow fishermen to apply for compensation.

Last year 10,000 tonnes of herring worth $11 million were caught in the sound.

Officials hope enough spawn will survive for a season next year.

The international conservation group Greenpeace also fears for "the population levels of marine mammals such as otters, sea lions and seals," said their spokeswoman Dorrie Smith.

Australia's most-sought fugitive captured

SYDNEY (API) — Australia's most-wanted man, sought for the theft of 40 million dollars ($33 million), was captured Wednesday after a two-week manhunt that stretched all the way across the outback.

John Friedrich was the subject of a nationwide hunt since he vanished from Melbourne March 21, leaving his search-and-rescue company bankrupt with debts of 225 million dollars ($180 million).

Friedrich had been chief executive of the National Safety Council of Australia (NSCA) since 1986 and had transformed it from a one-aircraft operation into a fleet reaching into the South Pacific.

The NSCA collapsed the day after Friedrich disappeared.

The case caused a sensation in Australia, with news media alleging Friedrich had links to foreign intelligence organisations, flew espionage flights across the outback and dabbled in arms and drugs trafficking.

Friedrich was caught outside a gasoline station near Perth, the capital of western Australia (state), after driving 3,000 kilometres across the continent.

Police said Friedrich, who had shaved off his distinctive beard, offered no resistance.

Authorities caught up with him following a tip that his car was abandoned north of Perth Monday. A police spokesman said it appeared Friedrich had tried to book a ticket on a limousine coach back to Melbourne. As the dragnet closed in, a police spokesman said, "the mouse is there, it's just a matter of slipping it over his head."

Police said they were not sure if Friedrich was even his real name or whether he was an Australian citizen or an illegal migrant.

A West German newspaper said Friedrich appeared to be a

John Friedrich

Friedrich Hohenberger, who apparently faked his own death in 1974 after defrauding a West German construction firm of $200,000.

Friedrich's tearful wife Shirley had pleaded on national television for her husband to "come home to the children and clear up this mess."

Prime Minister Bob Hawke said media claims of intelligence involvement were "fanciful" and Defence Minister Kim Beazley rejected suggestions Friedrich used his operation to infiltrate sensitive intelligence gathering bases jointly operated with the United States, as well as Australian military installations.

The NSCA had a fleet of about 32 aircraft and was the country's largest private rescue operation, employing a staff of 450.

Friedrich was described by employees as "charismatic and a real charmer" and newspapers said he duped financial institutions into lending him millions of dollars with inadequate accounts and assurances of new equipment for collateral.

Hanoi sets date for pullout

PHNOM PENH, Kampuchea (API) — Vietnam announced Wednesday it would withdraw all its troops from Kampuchea by Sept. 30 to encourage a settlement of the 10-year-old conflict among warring Kampuchean factions.

The announcement was made by Vietnam and Kampuchea during simultaneous news conferences in Hanoi and Phnom Penh, the Kampuchean capital.

Prince Norodom Sihanouk, leader of the three-member Kampuchean resistance coalition, reacted cautiously to the announcement and said any withdrawal must be verified by the United Nations.

Vietnam previously said it would withdraw its troops by 1990, but would move the pullout up to September if a political settlement could be reached.

Wednesday's statement indicated the pullout would go ahead even without a settlement. It said the Kampucheans reserved the right to ask for foreign assistance if anti-government guerrillas threatened the Vietnamese-backed administration.

"Vietnam will withdraw from Kampuchea all of her forces by the end of September 1989," said the statement, read to reporters by Kampuchean Prime Minister Hun Sen. "The total withdrawal of Vietnamese forces and the cessation of all foreign interference and all military aid will put an end to the civil war and stimulate the Kampuchean parties to settle the internal aspects of the Kampuchean question before September 1989 on the basis of national reconciliation."

The statement said Canada, Poland, Indonesia and India had been invited to jointly monitor the pullout in coordination with a representative of U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar.

Hun Sen said the monitoring commission could number up to 600 people and might be asked to remain to monitor a general election after the war ends.

He said he would meet with Sihanouk in Jakarta, Indonesia, May 2 in a new effort "to resolve the problem of Kampuchea."

But Hun Sen rejected Sihanouk's previous demand that the Vietnamese-backed government in Kampuchea be dissolved prior to a general election.

"Only the Kampuchean people have the right to dismantle" the government through elections, he said.

World refugee figure rises

WASHINGTON (API) — The number of refugees who have fled their native lands rose by 1.1 million last year to 14.4 million, mostly because of civil wars in East Africa, the U.S. committee for refugees reported.

It estimated that another 14 to 20 million are refugees within their own countries. In many places, no careful figures are kept and there are many definitions of who is a refugee.

"These are not numbers. They are people," said Roger P. Winter, director of the committee, in a statement on its report. "Each one of these 14.4 million represents an individual human tragedy."

The committee is a private group financed by foundations, churches and contributions from individuals.

The largest new groups described in the annual report made public this week were:

— 335,000 who fled to

Ethiopia when a long-simmering revolt flared up last summer in Somalia. About 600,000 have been displaced within Somalia, which has a population of about eight million.

— Almost 250,000 Mozambicans who fled a 14-year-old revolt against their communist government by the RENAMO guerrilla movement. The committee says 1,147,000 Mozambicans have now gone to other countries and two million of the country's 15 million people have been violently uprooted within its borders.

— More than 150,000 refugees east to Ethiopia because rebel fighting against the government of the Sudan. They brought the total of Sudanese there to 350,000. About two million people are reported to have lost their homes.

The largest number of refugees comes from Afghanistan: more than 5.9 million, according to the committee's figures. They live mostly in Pakistan and Iran.

Palestinians — 2.3 million — make up the second largest group. Ethiopia, to which 700,000 refugees have fled, has seen about 2.1 million of its own people flee abroad.

Most of the Afghans have fled in the last eight or nine years. Some Palestinians left more than 40 years ago when Israel became a state, and their children and grandchildren are considered refugees.

U.S. Secretary of State James Baker told Congress last month that he is planning to ask for another $100 million this year for refugees, in addition to the 412 million already available. For the following year, the administration of President George Bush is asking a cut in spending.

Baker said his department will complete a review of its refugee programmes soon after May 1.

Honest mayor fines himself

PARSIPPANY, New Jersey (AP) — When Mayor Frank Priore learned recently that his driver's licence expired in 1987, he did more than rush to have it renewed. He suspended himself for one day without pay. "I think that was the fairest thing I could do with myself," Priore said Wednesday. Priore said he didn't realise he had been driving illegally until he was contacted by a reporter. As head of the city's police department, he said he had to set an example. So he went to the police chief and told him to write him a ticket. "He was kind of shocked," Priore said. "He said, 'I can't give you a ticket,' and I said, 'You're being ordered to give me a ticket.'" Priore said he decided not to be lenient on himself. A police officer driving with an expired licence would be suspended for a day without pay, so he said he decided he should face the same penalty. He will work through the one-day suspension, but will remove $231 from his pay. Priore said, adding that the ticket cost $20. Priore said he decided not to send himself to jail because he did not deliberately let the licence expire. He said the notice to renew probably was sent to his former address.

'Charlot's Year' begins

CORSIER-SUR-VEVEY, Switzerland (AP) — "Charlot's Year" has begun at this wine-growing village as it prepares to honour Charlie Chaplin on the 100th anniversary of his birth with a string of festivities. "Charlot" is the name French-speaking fans gave the world-famous comedian, who died here Christmas Day 1977 after spending a quarter of a century at Corsier. Festivities officially will begin in Vevey, the Lake Geneva town just below hillside Corsier, on April 16, the day Chaplin was born in London in 1889. Swiss President Jean-Pascal Delamuraz is scheduled to attend a ceremony naming a "Square Chaplin," which already features a near-life-size statue of his movie character with trademark bowler hat, moustache and walking stick. Chaplin, who was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1975, and his wife, Oona, often strolled along the lake nearby. Lady Oona continues to reside at the Manoir de Ban, the 18th-century Manor above Corsier that Chaplin bought in 1953. A special show opening April 29 and running through summer will feature photos, documents and other exhibits focusing on the time Chaplin spent in the region.

'Dog could help sniff out cancer'

LONDON (R) — A woman whose life was probably saved by her dog's keen sense of smell has prompted British doctors to consider using dogs to help them diagnose cancer. In the latest edition of the Lancet Medical Journal, doctors at King's College Hospital in London said a woman was alerted to a cancerous mole on her leg after her mongrel spent several minutes, each day sniffing at it. Eventually the dog — a cross between a Collie and a Doberman — bit off the lesion, prompting the woman to see a doctor two years ago. He diagnosed cancer. "This dog may have saved her owner's life by prompting her to seek treatment when the lesion was still at a thin and curable stage," the article said. The doctors said it was worth considering using dogs with a highly-developed sense of smell to help diagnose cancer. The doctors said it was possible malignant tumours emit unique odours undetectable to man but easily sensed by dogs.
